TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

John Charlier was born at Gerson near Reins in Chaupagne, in the year 1393. He took the name by which he is most commonly known from the town which had the honour of giving him birth. He was the eldest of twelve children, no less than seven of whom joined the monastic life.

Having being educated at the college of Navarre in Paris, and having passed through varions minor functions and offices he was finally elected to the dignity of Chancellor of the Parisian University, and Canon of Notre Dame.

Soen he became one of the most famous churchmen of his time, chiefly on account of his writings, and the prominent part he took in public affairs. No voice carried more weight with it at the famous Council of Constance than the voice of Gerson.

His writings are very numerous, filling five large lollo volumes; and are dogmatic, noral, disciplinary, ascetic and miscellaneous.

As an indication of the eminent character bebears as a writer in spiritual matters, we may mention that many have credited him, though without sufficient reason, with the authorship of that book of books, "The Imitation of Christ."

We think it a pity that Gerson's writings, at least his ascetical ones, are not better known Frsquently do we meet with quotations from them in the works of others, and we are invariably struck by their admirable weight and wisdom; but how few now read or even know awthing about the writings themselves.

That which signalised Gerson most pertups was, that he was one of the most practical of writers, and one of the most practical of men; and for this reason has he been honoured with a title of which even a St. Bernard or a St. Bonaventure might be justly proud—manely, "Christianissimus Doctor," the most Christian of the Doctors.

Perhaps nothing better evidences the thorough practicalness of his character than the work to which he devoted the later years of his life, and which, remotely at least, gave occasion to his writing the famous little work which we have now the privilege of presenting in an English dress to the Englishspeaking public—"De Parvulis ad Christum trahendis."

Having returned after an enforced absence of several years to his native country, being then pleity well advanced in life, Gerson retired to Lyons and took up his residence in the Monastery of the Celestines, of which his brother was then Prior. Here he occupied himself in spiritual exercises, in writing books, and also in catechising and training children and hearing their confessions. This last was the work of his own choice; indeed it was his work of predilection. Always pious and adways zealous he was most desirous to do all the good he was able for his fellow-men; and here was his method of doing it (except of course when duty required him to be otherwise employed): instructing and exhorting children, and hearing instructing and exhorting children, and hearing their confessions. It was by this species of occupation he thought he could render himself most useful to God and to his fellow-men. Gerson's belief was, and in this we venture to maintain that he was only following the mind of his Divine Master, that if you want to save humanity you must save the man; and if you want to save the man you must save the child is to enlighten it, above all with religious knowledge, to make good impressions upon it, to execrcise it in piety and virtue, to bring it to the Sacraments, and secure that it always receives these Sacraments worthily and well.

The particular means which he relied on most of all for reforming and training the child was CONFESSION—Confession sincerely and honestly made.

Hence, conscious to himself of having received from God qualities and gifts that made him an efficient confessor of children, he gave himself to this work of hearing their confessions; and once he engaged in it he continued to devote himself to it till the hour of his death.

Some of the magnates of the University, however, did not look at things in the same light as Gerson did: they thought it ridiculous that a man of his position, dignity, talents, and reputation should spend his time in such lowly and insignificant work as teaching the rudiments of religion to children and hearing their confessions, and so they began to rally him on the point, and to write lampoons (I believe) upon him, and to hamper and oppose him in his work in every way. It is well for posterity that they did so, for otherwise we should never in all probability have heard of this excellent little book, "De Parvulis ad Christum trahendis," for it never would have been written.

Gerson was too spiritual a man to be discomposed by the petty persecutions of his adversaries, but he knew that the cause of children was being jeopardised and injured by their conduct, and so he determined that this should not be; he even made up his mind to utilise the opportunity afforded him to strike a blow on beland of children which would by the grace of God tell for his generation, which would tell, it might be, for many generations yet to come. He accordingly took up his pen and wrote the following little treatise. The moment men read it, they were clearly convineed that terson was right, and that his adversaries were wrong; that the work he was engaged in was a pre-eminently good and useful work; that his principles were sound, and his methods unimpeachable; that in looking after the spiritual interests of children he was doing a work as wise and as beneficial, thun if he were engaged in any other good and useful occupation whatsever.

Not concent with defending himself Gerson in his little book champions the cause of children with exquisite tact and extraordinary power. He demonstrates in the clearest and most vigorous manner the supreme importance of chilghtening them, forming them, training them to habits of virtue whilst they are yet young, arguing out his points from exson, from experience, and from the authority of the great both among Pagan and Christian writers; and arguing especially from the teaching and example of Christ Himself. He lays down also the principles and methods to be followed in this work of disciplining and training the young, and in doing so gives most useful suggestions and lessons to priests, to parents, to teachers—in fact, to everyone in any way charged with the care of children.

The book, quite a "classic" in the original, we freely confess, suffered much in the translation; but even so, with all the faults our unskilfulness has imported into it, we venture respectfully, and not without some confidence, to present it to the public, hoping they will remember that it is given them purely out of an affectionate zeal and regard for the Little Ones of Christ, and with a view to aiding in some small way in the great work of their moral and religious training.

THE TRANSLATOR.

THE EDITOR'S PREFACE.

ADDRESSED PRINCIPALLY TO THE CLERGY.

THE serious duty which rests upon the paster of feeding his flock with the food of the divine word involves in a particular manner the instruction and education of the children committed to his care. For he cannot but be aware that it is in childhood the seed of faith and grace, implanted in baptism, should bud forth, and indeed produce its fruit. It is at this age that wholesome sentiments, that christian virtues should be infused into and impressed upon the soul: that the first steps should be taken, and the foundation laid, for the due honour and credit of our holy religion, for the good order of our parishes, and the peace and tranquillity of our families and of society; it is in these early years that even eternal salvation itself should, as far as possible, be made certain and sccure-all which effects, as experience teaches, are sure to follow, if only the pastor be careful enough to nourish those tender ones of his flock with the salutary truths and principles of our holy faith.

Wherefore from their earliest years children to be imbued with the fear of the Almighty; and the most zealous care should be taken to train them in the practice of daily pious exercises, of frequent confession, and in due course of frequent communion.

To effect all this is, indeed, an arduous tast; but what might be impossible with men is not by any means impossible with God, who knoweth how to give wisdom to little ones, and who filleth "their mouths with praise," not unfrequently revealing to them what he hath kept hidden from the prudent and the wise.

Painful as the parturition is, so to speak, by which Christ is formed in the soul of a child, yet such pain is sure to be in due time succeeded by sentiments of joy and consolation; like as in the case of a woman, who, when she is in labour, hath sorrow; but who, when she hath brought forth her child, no more remembereth her anguish for joy that a man is born into the world. And how great, how manificent will not be the reward which the Lord will bestow upon him who shall have taken care of and nurtured the child; who shall have endcavoured to impress upon it the image and likeness of the Ahnighty.

In every age this work of educating and training children has been of sovereign importance in the Church, but never could it have been of greater moment than in these present unhappy times, when men, especially those in power, have conspired against the Lord and his Christ; when they are making every effort to wrest the little ones from the bosom of the church, and from the school of the Saviour; when they are even going so far as to strive to make them apostatise completely from God, and to live without God in the world. For as Pius IX., of most holy memory, not long since declared, these men, "not content with banishing religion from human society at large, must drive it from the home and the family as well. Their doctrine is that the domestic society (the family) springs from and owes its existence to the civil; and that consequently the rights which parents have over their children, and above all the right of educating them, are derived from and dependent upon the civil institution-that is, upon the state. What these crafty and deceitful men principally aim at by their nefarious doctrines and devices is-to remove the education of youth entirely from under the salutary influence of the church, and to cause their minds, while yet so soft and tender, to be infected and depraved by every species of error and vice. Indeed all those who at any time have been desirous to cause trouble in church or state, to overturn social order, and to bring about the destruction of all rights, human and divine. have placed all their hopes in and directed all their efforts to this one thing-the misleading and the corrupting of the young. Wherefore they never cease to harass the church by every species of iniquitous device; and they never grow weary of proclaiming her the enemy of all progress in useful enlightenment and civilisation, and for that very reason deserving of being excluded from all control over the education of youth; and this mendacious assertion they have the effrontery to make, notwithstanding the church, as the monuments of history so incontestably and so magnificently prove, has at all times given the greatest possible assistance to the state in the matter of christian education and civilisation (Litt. Encycl. Quanta cura, 1864; Syll., prop. 45, 49).

So downward, alas! has been the course of these impious men, lapsing as they have been from one error into another, that at length we have come to those perilous and evil times, foretold by Christ and His Apostles, when "lying teachers would bring in sects of perilous and would deny Him who bought them." How many youths are there now-a-days everywhere to be found who have unfortunately been betrayed by teachers of this kind into the snares of the evil one—youths of whom it can be said, in the words of the Apostle, that they are "lovers of themselves, covetons, haughty, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, ungrateful, wicked, without affection, without perce, slanderers, unmerciful, without kindness, traitors, stubborn, puffed up, lovers of pleasures; who turn away their hearing from the truth, and will be turned unto fables; who despise government, and who accounting as nought the wisdom that descends from above follow after that which is earthly and sensual. (Epist. SS. Paul, Peter and James.)" Wherefore let all truly christian parents, let ecclesiastics of every degree, but above all let the pastors of the flock, have nothing so much at heart as to mould and form children in accordance with the standard of christian morals: and let them with all truly apostolic courage offer in this important matter incessant opposition to the iniquitous designs of men. Pastors must not in this respect be inert or careless, for if through any fault on their part even a single lamb be torn by the ravening wolf from the fold, terrible is the account they shall have to render to the Almighty. And it should ever be their care to make the most strenuous exertions to become masters in the truly exalted science of educating and training the young;

constantly praying for light in this respect to the Almighty, who is at all times so desirons to grant and to accomplish whatsoever will be for the 'dvantage of those youthful souls, always so dear to Him.

To stimulate and direct one's real in this great work of the christian education of youth, nothing can be more useful than frequently to read over and seriously to reflect upon the contents of this golden hitle back, entitled: A TREATISE ON BRINGING CHILDREN TO JESTS CHRIST. For in this book the pious and learned John Gerson, Chaucellor of the University of Paris, has gathered together in the most admirable manner everything be had learned concerning the education of children, either from his own experience or from the Scriptures and the Fathers, or indeed from the wise and learned men of every age.

This universally commended little work contains in a comprehensive form almost everything that need be known regarding the diffient but important task of forming Christ in the souls of children, either by teachers, pastors or confession.

A TREATISE

ON BRINGING THE

-0256200-

Suffer the Little Children, and forbid them not to come to me; for the kingdom of heaven is for such.

O'ra Supreme Law-giver and Teacher Jesus Christ has, by His instructions and the example of His life, bequeathed to His Church a body of doctrine, which will suffice for all time for the guidance of the faithful of every age and condition; of this our holy faith assures up.

And since children and youths constitute no insignificant portion of the Church, He has not been without making adequate provision for them as well as for others. For children, indeed, He would seem to be specially solicitous. To such lengths does He carry His zead and tenderness in their regard that His divine anger is always certain to be aroused whenever any one is rash enough to prevent them from coming to Him, whether this be done from pride, harshness, severity, imprudence, thoughtlessness or any other cause. "Prevent not," He says, "the little children from coming to Me."

And as if to justify Himself for this indigmunt zeal of His on behalf of children, He gives at once this weighty and all-sufficient reason, a reason verily divine—"For the kingdom of heaven is for such."

St. Mark, when narrating the event which gave rise to this expression of the Savious, says—"And the disciples rebuked those that brought them (the children); which when Jesus saw, He was much displeased, and saith to them, "Suffer the little children to come to me, and forbid them not;" and then, continues the Evangelist, "Jesus embracing them, and laying His hands upon them, blessed them."

These weighty and suggestive expressions of our Lord and the sacred writer, when duly considered, will be seen to convey a severe rebuke to those, no matter who they be, who in any way set themselves against the spiritual interests of children; who by any means whatever prevent them from coming to their Saviour. And, indeed, well do all such persons merit rebuke.

However, let us not, when we undertake to champion the cause of children, give way to any bitterness of feeling or severity of invective; iet us rather imitate the gentle and simple ways of children themselves, in this following the example of the Saviour, who even while angry with His disciples administered His reproof them in the mildest and gentlest terms, merely saying to them, "Suffer the little children to come to me."

In fine, when pleading on their behalf, let us regulate our language in accordance with the nature and dispositions of children themselves, not being anxious to use the language of contention and disputation, or even the ordinary style of human speech, but being ready, if need be, to lisp and babble in our words as mothers and nurses are wont to do when they speak with little ones. If only we make ourselves understood in what we say we shall be quite content. The object we have in view is, not to argus, not to convict others of error, much less to east ridicule upon them; but merely to bring forward certain reasons why children should come to Christ, and to remove, as far as may be, those obstacles which, unhappily, but too often prevent them from coming to Him.

We shall, therefore, in the following little work be as simple, clear and orderly as we can, dividing it for this purpose into four chapters, or, as we shall call them, reflections.

In the first we shall endeavour to show how necessary it is for children to come to Christ; how beneficial for themselves and for the Church.

In the second we shall speak of those who scandalise children; who in so many ways prevent them from coming to Christ.

In the third we shall treat of the commendable zeal of those, who labour to conduct children along the path that leads to Christ.

The fourth will be an apology for our own personal ministry in regard to children, together with an appeal to the little ones to continue to come to the Saviour through means of that ministry, lumble though it be.

All that I shall say, particularly in this latter part of the book, I unreservedly submit to the kind and considerate judgment of my superiors. Nor do I desire in anything I shall say to lay stress on any opinion or wisdom of my own but choose rather to be guided by the prudent counsel of my spiritual friends, in this way tempering my zeal, such as it is, by a spirit of humility, that so it may not cause me to run into any indiscreet excess. As long, however, as these my good friends are with me in what I say, I shall easily disregard all that narrowminded or evil-meaning men may put forward against me, knowing that one can come to Christ, to use the words of St. Jerome, "as well by bid as by good repute."

FIRST REFLECTION.

How necessary it is for Children to come to Christ; how advantageous for themselves and for the Church.

"It is good for a man to have borne the yoke from his youth." The yoke here referred to is identical with that of which Our Blessed Saviour speaks when He says that "His yoke is sweet and His burden light."

The reason it is so advantageous to have borne this yoke from the days of childhood is easily understood; for the sooner one takes it up, and the more carnest one is in carrying it, the more abundant is the grace given to the soul; and we know the more grace there is in the soul the more is the soul itself helped, strengthened, and nourished.

On the other hand, if a person does not put on this yoke at an early age, if he does not correspond with grace at a season when he is so capable of corresponding with it. if on the contrary he rejects and despises it, the inevitable consequence will be, that by a just judgment from the Almighty he will forfeit all claim to the divine favours in later life. But then if God withdraws his graces from him, but is to become of him? The simple truth is, he cannot be saved; he cannot by possibility live the supernatural life; he must inevitably go headlong into sin.

You think perhaps that it is too difficult for you to attain to christian virtue while you are yet young, yet pure and innocent; if so, how will it be with you when you are older, when your innocence shall have been frittered away and lost, when you shall have become estranged from your Creator, when you shall find yourself burthened, perhaps, and broken with a very load of vices and sins; how little will you then be able to practise or acquire the virtues of a christian?

The first-fruits of the season, whether from the garden, the vineyard or the field, are the most acceptable offering to give to a friend. Even so it is with the service which souls give to tool in the spring-time of life; such service is much more pleasing to Him than that which is given in later years, when, also; people turn to Him, not so much because they are desirous for His sake to relinquish their sins, as because these sins have ceased to possers any longer attractions for them.

"With us, unhappy mortals," says the p.e.t. "that portion of life which is the most excellent and precious is the first to pass away." This better and more excellent portion, therefore, it is that we ought to conservate to the Almightty, and not the comparatively valueless there of a decreadi and languishing old age.

And in truth what other lesson than this does the Scripture intend to convey to us when it says that the most acceptable and "most perfect praise" which tool receives is that which comes to Him "from the lips and hearts of the young."

Moreover, if we take into account the force of habit, which according to Aristotle is a sort of second nature, it will be seen that nothing can be more galling to the soul, and nothing more wicked and detestable in itself, than a habit of vice; while, on the other hand, there is nothing more sweet or agreeable, nothing more divine, than a habit of virtue. And hence it is that we have the philosophers and poets unanimously agreeing with the theologians, that nothing can be of greater importance than that souls shouldexent themselves while yet young to root all evil out of their hearts, and implant in its stead good and virtuous dispositions.

"Habit," says Virgil, "is everything for the youthful mind."

And Cicero lays down the principle that everyone should labour to be virtuous from the very beginning, remarking at the same time that though virtue be at first irksome and difficult, yet practice will soon make it easy and pleasant

"What you can in the beginning but ill bear," says Ovid, "accustom yourself to it, and you will soon be able to put up with it easily enough."

And with him Horace entirely agrees; for he says—"Train the steed while he is yet young and he will afterwards be obedient to the rider's hand; let the young hound see from time to time the skin or even the image of the prey, and he will begin ere long to hunt the prev itself in the woods. So also must it be with you, young person, whoever you be; whatever habits you would wish to be yours in later life, these you must begin to cultivate from the very commencement; if you want to be virtuous then you must learn to be virtuous now; nor need you be afraid that the virtue you acquire in the days of your youth will afterwards easily abandon you, for virtue once acquired always clings, like as the odour of a perfume continues to adhere to the vase which once contained it."

Finally, if, as Averroes relates, the force of habit is clearly and terribly witnessed in the iniquitous customs and the sacrilegious superstitions which hold sway in certain nations, if it appears also in the case of persons, who, like Saint Augustine and so many others, have become the slaves of vice, may not its power be demonstrated even more strikingly still in those who, enjoying all the advantages of the true religion, accustom themselves to the virtues which it tea-thes, and who, as remarked before, have the good dispositions they are daily acquiring continually augmented and strengthened by the all-powerful graces so plentifully bestowed upon them from on high?

There is a certain false and pernicious proverbwhich, I confess, I can never hear but with sentiments of disgust and abhorrence—"Angel in youth, reprobate in age." If there were the slightest truth in this saying; if he who from the first struggles against the evil tendencies of human nature and tries to break down their power is afterwards likely to fall away and become the slave of Satan, what then is to be expected of him who begins at an early age to indulge his evil propensities, and who as time goes on superadds to these propensities all the fearful tyranny of vicious habits! Must not such a one be infinitely more likely to become "a reprobate in age" than the other?

Impious as this adage is, yet it has found a certain amount of credence among the unthinking multitude; and to what purpose? To serve, unfortunately, as an encourge nent to wicked youths to continue in their evit ways, and to prevent them being checked and corrected by the edifying example of their more virtuous companions, who, alas! lie under this double disaduantage—that they are everywhere the fewer in number, and are very frequently too weak and too inconstant to maintain their good and edifying conduct, in presence of and in opposition to the wicked and scandalors example of their associates.

And after all what wonder is it that the corrupt and wicked children should be so numerous, and the innocent and virtuous so few? How could it be otherwise? For do we not see oucery side things sunctioned and commended in children which should be utterly reprobated and condemned in them—pride and vanity; haughtiness of look and bearing; profanity, frivolity and obscenity in conversation; worldliness, effeminacy, rensuality in all their forms; when such things as these are permitted, when they are even encouraged in children. What is to be expected of them or how can they turn out in after life? Alas! the present deplorable condition of christian society gives to the question tut too meiancholy an answer.

He certainly was a wise and enlightened man, and not in the least in error, who maintained that the best and most effectual way to improve the morals of the faithful generally was to make a beginning with the children. Children being more innocent than others, or at all events not having vice so deeply rooted in them, are much more susceptible of christian discipline and training; not, indeed, that they are not as children subject to a certain drawback or defectiveness in this respect, for it must be confessed they are; and it is to this that Aristotle refers when he says that children are inapt learners of moral science (though by this latter observation he by no means intends to insinuate that it is useless to teach it to them, for in such case he would be contradicting himself, having already asserted in his writings that it is useful, and even necessary, to do so.)

ral infirmity of their young minds, are gifted with a special aptitude for taking in the primary ideas and principles of good, above all when they have not been permitted to become already imburd with any false or unsound ideas, when as yet no vicious maxims have been allowed to take root in their hearts. As new bottles are the best and most suitable for holding good and costly wines, so the minds of children are the best and fittest receptacles for primary christian truths; and as trees that are young are the most pliable to the gardener's hand, so children are of all others the most ensity moulded and trained to good and virtuous habits.

Very different is it with those who are older and whose habits have been already formed; with difficulty can they be changed or moulded; you may "break such, but you will scarcely been them." "If the Ethiopian," says the prophet Jeremias, "can change his skin, or the leopard his spots, you also may do well when you have learned evil."

Now, if, as we have been showing, the refermation and improvement of morals ought to begin with the children, where, I ask, could such a sacred and salutary work be better initiated than in the city of Paris? The children of that celebrated centre will come in the course of time to be largely dispersed throughout Christendom, and hence if they are only properly brought up and trained they cannot help but be the source of very widespread good in the world, being the means of enlightening and edifying many both in their own and other countries, but especially in their own

From all we have heid down in the foregoing reflection one conclusion strictly follows; it is this—that no one should ever dare, either by word or deed, either openly or secretly, to throw an obstacle in the way of the fulliment of the mandate of the Saviour—"Suffer the little children to come to me; "and he who presumes to do so is the enemy of the church, labours for her overthrow, and prepares in some measure the way for the reign of Antichrist on e-rth.

SECOND REFLECTION

Of those who scandalise Little Children, and prevent them in so many ways from coming to Christ.

"He that shall scandalise one of these little ones that believe in Me, it were better for him that a mill-stone would be hanged about his neck, and that he should be drowned in the dorbh of the sea."

We are not to understand the "fittle ones." here mentioned as referring only to those who are children in the spiritual sense, but must take the words in their literal meaning as referring to children properly so called. Indeed we must understand them primarily and principally of children, who from their simplicity and inexperience are more open to scandal and more likely to be ruined by it than others.

"The child," says Horace, "is like soft wax, which easily takes an impression; only, unfortunately, he is more likely to be impressed by evil than by good; and," he adds, "let the child be once corrupted, let virtue be once disfigured or effaced in his soul, it will then be found most difficult afterwards to renew its image within him."

The Satiric Poet also, well knowing how casily children are scandalised, lays down the following maxim: "Maxima debetur puero reverentia—" the soul of the child should be held in the greatest reverence; because without this reverence people will not refrain from saying and doing things in the presence of children which must inevitably cause their innocence to le lost. It was but another way of putting the injunction of the Saviour— "Suffer the little children to come to Me;" for what those do who not having reverence for children scandalise and lead them into sin, is simply this—they prevent them from coming to Christ.

It is deserving of notice what reasons our Divine Lord assigns for the two-fold denunciation He utters—the one against those who scandalise children, and the other against those who prevent them from coming to Him; it is the same in both cases—namely, the district of the children; for in the former case He says. "Their angels see the face of their Father who is in heaven;" and in the latter—"The kingdom of heaven is fer such."

Let us now explain the nature of scandal, and the various ways in which it is given to the detriment and ruin of the souls of children.

Scandal is some exterior circumstance, geneally something speken or done, which gives rive to the injury or rain of another's soul. He therefore is guilty of scandalising children who in any way does harm to their souls; who is the means of leading them into sin; who is the culpable cause or occasion of their going aside from the path that conducts to Christ.

Scandal may be given in two ways directly and indirectly.

As regards indirect scandal, he is guilty of it who does not prevent evil from accraing to another's soul, when he could and should prevent it; or, again, a person would be guilty of indirect scandal who, feeling himself called to the glorious work of aiding and resenting human souls, should permit himself to be turned aside therefrom, either by the open censures or hidden calumnies of evil tongues, or by any of the other countless persecutions the spirit of wickedness may stir up against him.

The Apostles were guilty of the two kinds of scandal on the occasion before referred to; they were guilty of direct scandal-when they strove to prevent the children from coming to Christ; they were guilty of indirect when they angrily rebuked the women who wished to bring them to Him.

How great their folly and blindness on this occasion was clearly shown by the feelings of indignation which their conduct aroused within the breast of the Saviour.—" Whom when Jesus saw," says the Evangelist, "He was much displeased." Certainly that must have been highly reprehensible conduct on their part which could excite the anger of Him whose meekness and patience were so remarkable; which could disturb the screnity of Him who was the very fountwin-head of all screnity and sweetness possible.

For the present moment I cannot recall any other incident in the Gospel which in the same way aroused the Saviour's indignation. With even such persons as publicans and sinners, notwithstanding all their crimes. He was the very essence of meekness and gentleness, and this despite the scornful protests of the self-righteous and hypocritical Pharasees, who were wont to tannt Him with his friendship and familiarty with this class of persons, saving to Him "Why do you eat with publicans and sinners?"

As for us christians, let us carefully avoid all giving of scandal, direct and indirect, lest we bring down upon ourselves the anger of God, which, be it remembered, is infinitely more terrible than the anger of men.

That those who by direct and overt words or actions lead others into sin are guilty of scandal is evident to everyone. Yet there are many who do this: there are many who not merely indeed do evil in the presence of others, but who glory in the doing of it; who even take pride in the most heinous enormities; who, animated by a spirit verily diabolical, try to get as many as they can to become sharers in their own iniquities, just as if the one thing they had at heart was that when lost themselves they should not be lost alone, but should have as many as possible going down with them into the abyss.

As Pagan Rome was not without her Cataline, so the Church of Christ is not without those who conspire against the well-being of her children; who mislead and corrupt them, and drag them into their own excesses. So blinded are these unhappy men by the evil passions that devour them that they cease to be any longer under the influence of faith; and being delivered over to a sort of reprobate sense they indulge in those abominations mentioned by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Romans; nay, incredible as it may seem, in enormities still more execrable and hateful. Carried away by the fire of their evil desires they have no regard for the virtue either of stranger or of kindred; they spare not even the innocence and purity of childhood itself; no, everything must be spoiled, everything besmeared by the foulness of their detestable misdeeds. To such a depth does their lecutionsness sometimes bring them down that what is right and what is wrong, that virtue and vice become all the same to them, neither being much better or worse than the other; so that we cunnot rogard Origen as being in any way in error when he declared that the only difference between a man possessed by a devil and a man inflamed by his wicked possion is, that the frenzy of the one is a misfortune for which he himself is not to blame, while that of the other must be imputed to him as his own abominable wickedness.

Can we be surprised then that in these our times much more than in any other "the thoughts and desires of man's heart should be prone to evil from his youth," seeing that children, who already possess within then the original corruption of human nature, are now-adays made familiar with sin from their earliest years; are made to drink in the poison of it, as it were, from their very mothers' breasts?

In addition to all this, there are multitudes of parents and instructors who bestow little or no care on the morals of the children committed to their charge; the idea of diligently watching over them, of zealously discipling and training them (duties to which they are strictly bound), being the last thing in the world that suggests itself to their minds.

And this being so, how can these poor children, thus left without an instructor or a guide, thus abandoned to their own unaided inexperience, surrounded too by a multiplicity of dangers, not to speak of their being for ever attended by a spirit of evil who unceasingly plots and labours for their destruction—under such circumstances as these, how can children do otherwise than most miserably fall away from innocence and virtue?

But would to God it were only from neglect that children had to suffer! What is far more deplorable still, they are in thousands of instances positively corrupted and ruined by the multitudes of scandals that are thrown in their way.

Evil deeds are done before their eyes; evil expressions and conversations are poured into their ears; improper pictures are exposed before their view; dangerous and impious books and periodicals are put into their hands—how with such pestiferous influences as these for ever assailing them can the children possibly be virtuous? how can they help being anything else but sinful and depraved?

The poetic satirist has declared that nothing so surely or so quickly corrupts the heart of man as had example given around the domestic hearth, above all when that example proceeds from those who are placed in authority over us.

Experience proves the truth of this, for do we not invariably find that the son walks in the wicked footsteps of the father: that he does just what he sees his father doing before him?— "Like parent, like child," as the proverb expresses it.

And here we have the reason why there are so many evils nove-a-days in society and the world for which there seems to be no remedy. For to remedy an evil the first thing necessary to be done is to recognise it; but now many things which are patently wicked and immoral are no longer regarded as such; they are, on the contrary, maintained to be innocent and lawful. "The immoral," as Seneca puts it "has ceased to be immoral;" the vices have become virtues.

Scandals of this kind, treacherous, unsuspected scandals—evil impressed upon children as if it were good rather than evil—these are the most disastrous scandals of all. Woe unto those who are guilty of them, who by means of them prevent children from coming to their Saviour.

Bad as those are who give scandal openly and directly, it would be difficult to say if they are more to be reprobated than those who give it covertly and secretly.

Of this class are those men who, when others devote themselves in all sincerity to the important work of instructing and training children, will not leave them in peace, but must oppose them, hamper them, scerely plot against them, suggesting that all this interest they profess to take in children, all this labour undergone in their behalf, comes neither from piety nor zeal, but is all mere show and shaus—all nothing but hypocrisy and pretence.

Now what is to be said of the individuals who are guilty of conduct such as this; what skall we say of their false and crafty method of acting? How shall we characterise it? Will it suffice to compare it to the cunning of the fox, or rather should we not liken it to that of the old serpent himself, who glides along smoothly and warrly, who lies in ambush secrety, and who when occasion offers bites with his deadly fance?

Hard as it may be to counteract direct and overt scandal, it is much more difficult still to prevent the harm done by this covert scandal we speak of, just as it is much more difficult to contend against an enemy who is secret and hidden than against one who is open and declared.

Would that those who are guilty of it would reflect upon and take to heart a certain precept of the wise man. Did they do so they would soon learn to put a top to their unworthy conduct. The precept is this—"Withheld not him from doing good who is able, if thou art able do good threeff also."

Oh! who will eatch for us those little foxes that ravage the vineyard of the Lord, and that trample down the blooming garden of the Church? Secretly and stilly do they creep in, betraying their presence in no way save by the traces they leave behind. And what traces are these? Flowers the most beautiful trampled down and destroyed; plants the most healthy and premising plucked up by the root; the work of the gardener frustrated and spoiled in a thousand ways.

How strange that men should lower themselves to this sly and underhand perpetration of so much mischief! What do they seek in it all? What advantage do they hope for? Rather what malice is it that has taken possession of their hearts and that makes them act as they do?

Some merely want to oppose the good done by ethers without being discovered opposing it: others are animated by a secret envy and jealousy at seeing their neighbour doing good which they are unwilling to do themselves; while others are so devoid of all piety and religion that when they witness anything of the kind in others they will not believe in it, but must endeavour to put it down as a certain ridiculous childishness and stupidity.

Alas! such is the world that it abounds with scandals. But woe to the world because it is so; and woe especially to those who are the authors of the scandals; better for them that they should perish from the earth than that they should be the guilty cause of raining is any souls, particularly the souls of children whom they prevent from coming to the Saviour

THIRD REFLECTION.

Of the commendable zeal of those who conduct Children along the path which leads to Christ

"HE that causeth a sinner to be converted from the error of his ways shall save his soul from death, and shall cover a multitude of sins."

Saint Gregory, commenting on these words of the Apostle, draws from them the inference, that of all the sucrifices which can be offered to the Almighty, that which is the most acceptable in His sight, is to labour for the salvation of souls.

If for the perishable things of time, if for the sake of those transitory goods which the Aposte reputes as loss rather than gain, men are so anxiously solicitous, if they strive and labour for them day and night, going at times to the length of exposing themselves to all sorts of dangers on their account, and if because they act to this way they are regarded as active, earnest, diligent men, and most useful members of society, what then is to be said of those who have no care, no zeal on behalf of the immortal souls of men. who experience no desire to promote the momentous interest of their eternal salvation; should not the sloth, the indifference, the evident want of faith of such persons be most severely censured and condemned; and is it not right that a much severer condemnation still should be visited upon those who oppose and strive to render futile the labours of well-meaning men, who endeavour to rescue souls from perdition, who do what they can to bring little children to Jesus Christ. Should a mere dumb beast fall into a trench or into the mire, everyb dy at once runs to its rescue, and no one will heed in the least whether the day be Sunday or holiday, or any other day; nor will it all reprehensible or wrong. Why then should censure be passed upon or fault found with one who gives his time and his labour to the glorious work of bringing souls to Christ-souls who frequently have such sore need of being brought to Him: souls buried in the mire of sin and groaning under the burthen of iniquities; souls enslaved by habits of vice and heavily weighted, perhaps by poverty and all its attendant inconveniencies and miseries?

The Holy Ghost by the mouth of Solomon enjoins upon us to do all we can for our neighbour, and to do it generously and willingly. "Whatsoever thy hand is able to do, do it errnestly." And again, "In the morning sew thy seed, and in the evening let not thy hand cease, for thou knowest not which may rather spring up, this or that, and if both together, it shall be the better" (Eccl., ii., 6).

Miserable profligates in the world pay no heed to what others may say about them so long as they can indulge in their criminal delights, and shall the lover of Christ, the zealous worker for souls, be affrighted or turned aside from his course by every passing breath of censure, as if he were but some cowardly traveller who trembles at the shadow of every guivering reed? What! immortal souls, spiritual dwelling places of the Divinity, living temples asametuaries of the Holy Spirit, cities most sacced, kingdoms, which though yet on earth are truly celestial—these set on fire by hell around as, these being devoured and consumed by the various destructive human passions and vices; and we, shall we so fear the slanders of men or be so fast stuck in our own miserable sloth or indifference as not to be willing to run to their rescue?

A physician who gives his services to the sick gratuitously; an advocate who pleads for his clients without seeking remuneration; a workman who does his master's work and secks no pay—such men are extolled to the stars for their unselfishness and generosity. Shall the spiritual physician then, the advocate of souls, the workman in the vineyard of the Lord—shall he meet only with censure and ridicule ard opposition when he freely and heartily devoted himself to the salvation of the souls of children?

Where is the justice of this; does it look not rather like the most extravagant folly?

There are the poor children continually incited to evil by the pernicious lessons so incessantly given them, and must there be no one to oppose all this; no one to take the part of virtue; no one to unfold its charms before them so as to induce them to adopt and practice it? There are children lungry with the lunger of the spirit, crying for bread that can alone satisfy and nourish them; and is there to be no one to break it to them; or if those come forward who are willing to do so, must they meet with nothing but effronts and contradictions?

Surely all this is in direct opposition to the doctrine and example of Christ. Zeal, tender zeal, was what our Divine Saviour at all times practised. We know the striking and touching picture He made use of when He wished to describe His loving interest and tenderness-towards the soul of men. He compared Hinself to a hen gathering her chickens under her wings: to the creature which of all others, according to Saint Augustine, is the one most devoted and affectionate towards her young.

"She preads her wings," says the learned doctor, "she ruffles her feathers, she calls out it tender plintitive tones, and without having any care for herself or her own wants she attends only to these of her little brood; and should any enemy come upon the sence, oh! how stoutly and fierely will she not fight for them, defending them to the very last?

And we, who wish to be regarded as the followers and imitators of Christ, shall we have no zeal for souls, particularly the souls of children: shall we be without desire to do anything for them; or shall we work for them only fitfully and rarely, sometimes letting whole months pass by willout making a single exertion in their behalt; Althuay (God forbid.

Various are the means whereby children am be brought into the way that conducts to Christ. One is Catechism, or public religious instruction; another, personal admonition and advice: a third, the school with its teaching and discipline.

But besides there there is a fourth (one that is altogether peculiar to the christian religion), namely—Confession.

Whatever may be the opinion of others, I fer my part frankly acknowledge, that I look upon Confession, when it is all it ought to be, as the most direct and effectual means for bringing children to Christ.

By confession the most hidden disenses of the soul are laid open, that is, when the confessor arraitly and carefully examines into everything; doing this with such skill as to draw forth the wriggling serpent from the soul and drive out the poisonous virus from the heart, for if this virus, this poison, be not ejected from the soul of the child it will never grow or expand in Christ; it will always remain languid and infirm, nay, it will continue to lie dead and buried in a very sink of vices and sins.

And how deplorable then the condition of the child: he performs no work of life, he makes no movement tending to bring him to the Saviour; the thorn being still rankling in his wound, his moral corruption becomes greater and greater day by day; and his conscience, while torn by the stings of a bitter and fruitless remorse, will, instead of bringing him repentance and peace, but toos him about in confusion and misery of mind, and make him daily more and more reckless in giving way to the many criminal desires which will not fail to spring up within his heart.

Moreover, as it is in confession that the disease of the soul is discovered and made known, so it is there the proper remedy for it is pointed out and applied.

And as to relapse—what better or more effectual means to prevent it can there be then confession?

But perhaps someone will say. Oh! yes, confession is very good for children, but there is ue need for their going to it so very often, once, or at all events three or four times a year ought to be quite often enough.

Now we have given a sufficient answer to such an objection as this already when speaking of the creat diligence and zeal displayed by people in the world when there is question of their merely temporal interests. If they think they never can do enough to advance these interests, which after all are of no much consequence, why should there not be at least a similar eagerness and zeal as regards the most precious interests of the souls of children; why should there not be as intense an anxiety about the adoption, the frequent adoption of a means so powerful for promoting these interests as confession most undoubtedly is, though in saving this we are far from wishing to exaggerate or to counsel a frequency of confession which would be imprudent or excessive.

Would to God that all children made every year even one good integral and satisfactory confession!

But since the number of children is every-where great, and since the paschal season is so short that confessors can scarcely find the time to examine carefully and minutely into consciences, it is expellent, nay, it is necessary, for every child to make at some convenient time a general confession of the sins of his life to some wise and prudent confessor, doing this not hurriedly or by halves but seriously, leisurely and carefully.

There are three very good reasons why children should make such a confession.

The first is this, Multitudes of children seduced by their own passion or by the wickedness of others fall into very heinous sins, which they do not know how or have not the courage to confess. Now, in the confession we speak of the can be induced to acknowledge these sins if only they are duly instructed, admonished and interrogated; and having confessed them they can then be properly enlightened as to the malice that is in them, care being taken, however, not to give them a knowledge of evil that would be of prejudice to their souls, or should it happen that they come to know, through confession, of sin which they did not know before, they should forthwith be inspired with such a dread and abhorrence of it as will afterwards secure them against the misfortune of committing it. Thus the sins being fully confessed, and the malice of them being duly appreciated and deplored, the children will obtain for them a full and entire remission.

Another advantage of such a confession is that the children will henceforth know what sins they ought to confess, and in what manner they ought to confess them, besides which they will have the benefit of receiving on occasion of making this confession most effective -onesed and article never, on any account during their future lives, to disquise or conveal anything in their confessions

There is a third advantage also. It may happen that these children adverting in after life to their former sins will conceive certain troublesome scruples about them, and begin to think they must go over the confession of them again, a thing which would be much more difficult for them now, which would cause them much more confusion and shame, than in the simple and ingenuous days of childhood. But since they have made this general confession we speak of, their confessor can easily set their minds at rest by assuring them that they have dready fully complied with the obligation of confession, and they need not now or at any other time subject themselves to the orded of again declaring these former sins.

Yo one will consider these three advantages of trifling importance who knows what a fraviful tyranny false shome is capable of excercising over some souls, the more particularly when they have been guilty of certain heirones sins which are of their nature shameful, which are shameful and abominable even in the estimation of these guilty of them, which have had the effect of degrading and debasing not merely their bodies, but even their very minds as well.

Whosoever has been able to gather experience in this respect will, I think, acknowledge that it is almost as difficult to induce people of this kind to acknowledge their sins as it would be to cause a perpetually dumb person to speak.

Perhaps it will be said to me, or to persons like me who are very much engaged in the work of instructing the young or hearing their confessions—it is no use what you do for these childen; you are but wasting your time with them; they will not confess their sins to you; they will only tell you lies about them, and disguise them; or if they do acknowledge them what good in it all since they will immediately fall back into the same sins again.

Now let us make answer to the last part of this objection first. Children, it is said, will relapse into their sins. They may indeed relapse; but do not others who are no longer children. do not even grown persons relapse; yet we do not see them for this reason giving up confession. Does the sailor discontinue pumping the water out of the hold of his ship because after a while some more water has leaked in again? "We fight against vices," says Seneca, "not that we may get entirely rid of them, but that we may not become their slaves." And we wash our hands, not because they are clean, but because they are soiled; and because we know the oftener we wash them the cleaner they will be. and the less liable to have new defilements cling to them

I know very well children are apt sometimes to conceal their sins (do grown people never do so?) especially when they first begin to make their confessions. But even so, the truth can be got from them by little and little, if they are only taken gently and kindly, and carefully and skilfully commined. Or should they be unwilling to confess their sins at present, they will do so later on, when the fear of God shall have been developed in them and taken full possession of their hearts.

No doubt there may be a few, whom, as the Scripture says, "God has despised," and whom on that account "no one can correct;" nevertheless there will be always many who can be brought to confess and amend; and indeed were it only one in a month, or one in a year, that a zealous worker had thus rescued and saved, his labour would not by any means have been in vain; for we know the consoling truth of which the Holy Ghost assures us—"Charity covereth a multitude of sins."

Wherefore let every one, who (like myself) can look back upon sins of his own, whether in childhood or in later years, enkindle within his soul an ardent zeal for this glorious work of "covering" the sins of others; of covering them, that is, bringing about their forgiveness; let him exert himself to the utmost to "convert the sinner from the error of his way and to deliver his soul from death." And you above all, masters, teachers, rectors to the whose care communities of children lawe been entrusted—watch over your charge and keep them in the strictest discipline (and this I say to you in all simplicity and brotherly charity, and not as wanting to act the master towards you, or as having any doubts that you do not herein discharge your duty), and not merely never do anything or permit anything that would prevent those young souls from coming to Christ, but on the contrary do exercithing you possibly can to bring them to Him.

And since there is no class of persons among whom moral evil is so likely to be mutually contagious as among the young, let it be your care to use the utmost vigilance so as to discover the depraved, the infected ones among your pupils. "One tainted sheep," as the proverb says, "is enough to infect the entire flock;" even so, one corrupt youth is sufficient to contaminate many, even of the good among his or her companions. "With the perverse thou will be perverted" is the statement and warning of the Proplec (Ps. xvii., 27). And again, "They were mingled with the heathens, and learned their works, and served their idols, and it became a stumbling-block to them" (cv. 35)

You know how you would act if you were conscious that certain acts of theft, even trifling ones, were being committed by some one under your care; you would go to much trouble to discover the delinquent; and when you had discovered him you would severely reprove him; perhaps you would even go so far as to expel him from the society of his companions. But you should remember that there is another kind of theft which is much more criminal and harmful still than that of material things-a theft that may be justly accounted a species of sacrilege; it is robbing children of their innocence; violating, defiling, destroying the sacred temple of their souls. Against this sort of thievery you ought to be immeasurably more vigilant and more strict than against the other; and if it be out of your power to discover and to punish all who are guilty of it, at least you ought to make sure that whenever any culprit succeeds in escaping detection it will not be owing to any want of care or vigilance on your part.

But, perhaps, you will say—Oh! there are no culprits of this kind among those under my charge; or if there be, certainly I am not aware of it.

Would that there were none; would that there were only a few! It is to be feared, however, that if you only opened your eyes and looked into things somewhat more closely and carefully you would find there was good reason for thinking differently from what you do.

If tpon discovering a guilty party you publicly and severely chastise him, the chastisement may be very painful to the individual concerned, but it will be sure to act as a salutary deterent on a number of others; and this especially where there is question of an offence in that matter which modesty prevents us from naming.

Possibly your severity may have the effect of causing a few to withdraw themselves from under your authority, on the plea that you are too exerce, and your discipline too executing: even so, you will not thereby be a loser; a kind providence will look well to the interests of your school or your institute, and will bring you more numerous and more creditable pupils than those you have lost—pupils, who will be attracted as well by the regularity and discipline of the place as by the virtue and good conduct of its immates; for after all nothing is more lovable, and nothing has greater power to attract to itself, than genuine christian virtue and goodness.

Finally let us be permitted to admonish all without exception to watch over their conduct and intercourse with children, so that no one amongst those little ones of Christ way ever have to repreach them in the works of the propher—"In this way wherein I walked, they have hidden a snare for me" (Pa. exil., 4); or again—"They have hidd for me a stumbling-block by the war-side (Ps. exxix, 5).

Such a snare, such a stembling-block would be anything whatever, that either directly or indirectly, either in regard of the children themselves or those who work for them, would be a hindrance to the fulfilment of the words of the Saviour—"Suffer the little children, and forbid them not to come to Me."

FOURTH REFLECTION.

An apology for our own ministry in regard of Children, together with an appeal to them to come to Christ through the medium of that ministry humble though it be.

"If a man be overtaken in any fault, you who are spiritual instruct such a one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself lest thou also be tempted" (Gal., vi, 1).

No small knowledge certainly of human nature did that man possess who was the originator of the saying—"The art of arts is that of governing souls."

Sublime and difficult as this art is, nevertheless many persons presume to undertake it, though but very indifferently qualified for the task. Hence it is we have such frequent verification of the word of sacred Scripture—"The blind leading the blind;" hence also have we so many spiritual and moral evils menacing us on every side.

So little is the sublimity, the grandeur, of this work of disciplining and moulding souls understood, that if a person of mark, such, for instance, as a theologian or a man of letters, devote himself to it, especially in regard of children, he is at once looked upon as having abandoned his proper place and calling, and as inving done something foolish and ridiculous (a verdict which some people have thought well to pass upon myself).

It was into an error of this kind that the Apostles fell on the occasion of their turning away the women who wished to present their children to our Lord; for being as yet very imperfectly skilled in heavenly things they judged it unworthy of so great a Master and Doctor that He should give His care and concern to such insignificant beings as little children. This mistake, however, He was quick to point out to them, as well by the words He made use of as by His manner of acting towards the children.—Suffer, He cried out, "Suffer the little children to come to Me;" and then, as the Evangelist narrates, embracing them, and laying hands upon them He blessed them."

The important lesson conveyed to us in all this by our Divine Lord is confirmed by the words of Saint Paul quoted above. Those who would be instructors of others, savs the Apostle, should be spritual me, and should possess a spirit of gentleness and condescension; and they ought never to lose sight of their own infirmity and misery so that they may at all times be disposed to have due consideration and commiseration for the infirmity and misery of others.

But truly spiritual men, how rare they are !

Who it will be asked is the spiritual man. The spiritual man is he who judges things according to the spirit; who has learned from what he himself has suffered to feel for the sufferings of others; who is, solicitous, not for the things that are his own, but for those that are Jesus Christ's; who has his heart so replenished with Christian charity, humility and piety, that there can no longer be found room in it for miserable vanity and self-seeking; "whose conversation is in heaven;" who like one of God's angels is affected neither by words of praise or censure; who imitating the guardian spirits of men never allows the lowliness of his occupation to bring down his mind from the apprehension of things divine; who, while he heals the moral infirmities of others, takes care to preserve his own soul from contagion (being ever mindful of the warning of the Saviour, that it "profitch a man nothing to gain the whole world should he lose his soul," and never losing sight also of the injunction of the Wise Man— "Have pity on thy own soul pleasing God").

Finally, the spiritual man is one who never permits himself to be drawn away or allured by the outward attractions of creatures, but guided at all times by the clear light of reason takes account only of souls, of their sanctification and salvation.

Should these qualities be wanting in you, should you be easily disturbed by the opinions of men, easily put about by what they say or do against you, should you be readily puffed up by success or cast down by failure—you are then not a spiritual but a carnai man, and accordingly unsuited for the heavenly work of instructing others in the spirit of meekness.

These things being so (to go back to what I was saying about myself), I consider it more just that I should be eensured for my temerity in undertaking the instruction of children than that I should be reproached with having thereby lowered my dignity and self-respect; for in undertaking such an occupation what have I done only made boil to enrol myself among the number of the spiritual, compared with whom I know very well I am but as the crawling tortoise to the birds that soar

But then what am I to do? Some tell me,—even good and well-meaning men maintain it—that this is not at all the kind of work I should be engaged in. And they allege various reasons for this, particularly the four following:—

They say that my habits and ways are utterly different from those of the children, and that consequently I am unsuited to be their instructor. They allege that occupying the eminent position I do I ought to engage myself in works of a more honourable and exalted nature. Then they find fault with me as regards the circumstances of time and place in connection with my work for children. Finally they say that this line of conduct I have taken up is a singularity and an innovation, and cannot but give rise to very inconvenient criticisms and calumnics. Let us make a few remarks by way of reply to these allegations.

They say there is a great disparity between me and the children, between my habits of mind and theirs. This is certainly true. But why should I on that account be unable to render myself useful to them? Why cannot I accommodate my ways to theirs? Why cannot I bring myself down to their level? And if I but do this what is to prevent me from being of very great benefit to them?

Certainly one must condescend much to children if he is to do them good. "Pride and love," the poet says, "do not agree well together, and they will not be long found sitting side by side." If you hold yourself too high for children, if you do not condescend to them in all meckness and humility, and thus draw to yourself the affections of their young hearts, you may indeed endeavour to instruct them, but your instructions will be of no avail, they will not ever to listen to them, and still less will they care to put them in practice.

Wherefore if you would be of any use to children you must lay aside all haughtiness and sternness of manner; you must make yourself a child for the children's sake; you must put on their methods and ways, always excepting of course, their vices and defects, and more particularly everything, whether in look or word or gesture, that could in the least degree be out of harmony with the strictest purity and modesty.

"Human nature," says Scheea, "always so prone to rebel is much more easily led than driven; you will get good of it much better by gentleness than by sternness. And it has often been remarked that those of a generous and ingenuous nature (and this is true of animals no less than men) have this peculiarity about them, that they are much more powerfully influenced by caresses than by threats, that gentle methods have much more influence over them than those that are harsh and severe—considerations which if duly reflected on cannot but convince us what our manner of dealing with children ought to be.

Moreover, how will children, who are nuturally so excessively timid and bashful, be able to confess their sins, their indelicate sins especially, to him whom they have learned to dislike or perhaps to dread? or how will they confess them even to one who has not by his mildness and affability convinced them that he is their true, devoted, and affectionate friend?

But by what means will he be able to convince them that he is such a friend? By a spirit of condescension towards them, by showing himself pleased when they are pleased, by maifficsting an interest in all their concerns, even their recreations and amusements, by rejoicing with them when they have gained any little innocent or creditable success, such, for instance, as in the matter of their studies, by avoiding all larshness and bitterness towards them even when administering to them necessary correction. by treating them habitually in a gentle and kindly manner, thus making them feel, not merely that one has no dislike of them and is in no way estrauged from them, but on the contrary that the sentiment one entertains towards them is that of a sincere and affectionate greated.

If one does not comport oneself in this way towards children, if by his manner of treating with them he does not make himself pleasing and agreeable to them, the inevitable consequence will be that all the instructions and admonitions he gives them will be entirely fruitless; and should he be a priest they certainly will not make their confessions to him as then could.

I am confident that the Apostle Saint Paul did not adopt any other method than this in his dealings with children, for how could he have said that he made himself all things to all men to gain all to Christ, if he made an exception of children, if he did not make himself a child in order to gain them? And what right would he have to insist upon parents being gentle and kind towards their children, and on their "not provoking them to indignation lest they be discouraged." if he himself acted in a different manner, if he was cold and unkind to them, or kept aloof from them as being unworthy of his notice or of his society?

But, after all, what need is there I should go on reasoning in this way about the action of the Apostle since we have his own express declaration that this and no other was his method— "But we became little ones," he says, "in the midst of you, as if a nurse should cherish her children?" (Pixess, ii. -7).

Let us revert once more to the reasons the Apostle had for asserting that when we instruct those taken in any fault we ought to do so in a spirit of meckness; and let us at the same time see if our Lord does not, both by word and example, entirely agree in this matter with the thoughts and sentiments of the Apostle.

"Come to me," said the Saviour on a certain occision, "all you that labour and are burthened." He invited all to come to Him. But how were they to come unless encouragement was given to them to do so, unless He Himself made the way more or less easy for them.? But He did make it easy for them. How? By the gentleness and approachableness of His character; for was He not, as He Himself declared, meets and hamble of hearn?

In the lives of the ancient Fathers there are many incidents recorded, which go to prove what we are maintaining—viz., that nothing has greater power to induce people to rectify and amend their lives than meckness and gentleness—a truth, which even the heathen poet seems to indicate when he says—"The best and moet useful thing man possesses is his gentleness, his meckness."

It is narrated of Saint John, that divinely favoured Apostle, who was so wonderfully enlightened as to heavenly things, and who was able to write about them in so admirable a manner, that he did not think it beneath him to go so far as to kiss the hand of a most aban doned robber and murderer thereby to win him to God and His divine service.

And how was Saint Augustine gained over to the Church in which he afterwards became so shining a light, so eminent and useful a doctor? By the meekness and charity of Saint Ambrose. "I begau," says the Saint, speaking of Ambrose, "I began to love the man, not because he taught me the truth, but because he was kind to me." O most prudent Ambrose, man guided by the spirit of God! he did not, when encountering Augustine, puffed up as he then was with pride and his erroneous doctrines. turn upon him angrily and harshly, and tell him to begone from him, that he was a sinner, a heretic, a blasphemer; nothing at all of the kind. And if he did not treat the heretical Augustine in this way, how much farther would he have been from conducting himself with harshness or asperity towards the little children of the one true Church, the tender lambs of the fold of the Saviour?

Furthermore, since every act of Christ is not without its meaning, since it is in itself a lesson, we may be certain that when He invited the children to come to Him, and when He reproved the Apostles for trying to prevent thera. and when on their coming nigh He "laid hands upon them, embraced them, and blessed them," it was His intention in all this to convey to mankind a salutary and important lesson, as to what their manner of dealing with children ought to be

Who their, O nost loving Josus, will hesitate or be ashaurd to make himself little for the sake of children? Who will be so elated with a sense of his own importance, or so puffed up with his learning and wisdom, as to look down upon and despise those little ones because of their littleness, their weakness or ignorance, seeing that Thou, who art the Lord God, "blessed for every in whom are hid all the tressures of wisdom and knowledge," hat deigned in the excess of Thy goodness to stretch forth Thy sacred arms towards them and enfold them in Thy most pure embraces?

Far then from us be everything like hanghtiness and madue severity of manner towards children, which can only have the effect of repelling them from us and making them lose their confidence in us. This example of our Blessed Lord embracing and carresing children by far exceeds the admirable condescension of Scerates (so highly enlowised by the philosophers themselves), who, after discharging public functions of the highest importance, was accustomed to relax his mind by taking part in the amusements of children, even in such as were quite simple and puerile, not deeming that in all this he was doing anything in any way devogatory of his dignity or station. O, if the censorious Catos of the present day could have seen him on such occasions how would they not have laughed at him, and what fine derision would they not have heaped upon him!

In making these remarks we are far from connselling any intercourse with children which would be wanting in that strict reserve and decorum that it is always necessary to observe in our relations with them. Nevertheless to condescend to them, even so far as to participate in their games and anusements, is not merely harmless, it may even be of considerable utility to us. To say the least of it it is an innocent recreation for the mind; and besides it is a very excellent means of humbling ourselves before God, and thereby rendering to Him a certain most acceptable homage and reverence, not unlike to that which holy David rendered, when, divesting himself of his royal robes so as to appear vile in his own eyes, he danced with all his might before the ark.

This last is the very best motive one can have in his actions; and it is a motive with which one can scarcely go too far.

Moreover, does not the humbling of oneself in this way seem perfectly in keeping with the salutary injunction of Ecclesiasticus, which Cicero does not hesitate to adopt in his De Officiis—"The greater thou ort, the more humble threaff in all things" (iii., 20)?

And is it not also very much in harmony with the lesson taught by Our Lord, when, taking a child, He placed it before His disciples and said to them—"He that is lesser among you, he is the greater" (Inke, ix., 46); and again when he said—"Amen I say to you, whosever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall not enter it" (Mark, xyi., 15). I aver before God, in whose presence I dare state only what is true, that during the three years I have been ministering to children I have met with many, some even pretty well advanced in age, who have acknowledged to me that they never would have confessed their sins to any one, unless to somebody who, like me, would have been excessively kind to them and would have interregated and helped them; that they would not have confessed them though they were dying and knew they would have been damned for not doing so.

See then what gentleness and condescension can effect for children; see especially what a salutary work you can as confessor operate upon them if you but carefully admonish and interrogate them, and strive to manage them generally with a certain skilful prudence and tact; or rather see what God Himself will be sure to accomplish in them through means of your ministry, if while you honestly labour for them you also lumbly and confidently pray for His divine assistance, thereby bringing down his salutary blessing on all you do in their beluif.

Furthermore, I have heard it stated by men of many years experience in hearing the confessions of children, that they seldom or never had met with any one addited to certain vices who had previously confessed them to any pried; and they moreover declared they would not have confessed these vices even to themselves had they not treated them with the greatest gentlemess and prudence, and even taken the precaution of circumventing them by certain pious manarures and strategies.

Let me now reply somewhat briefly to the three other points alleged against me: for as to what is said in reference to my position and the dignity of my office I think I need not say anything more, having already given a sufficient answer on this head.

They contend that I ought to engage myself in occupations of a more exalted and important character.

For my part I do not know of anything of greater importance to which my weakness could devote itself than to rescue from the claws of the devil and from the gulf of hell the souls of children—those dear little ones who constitute such a precious portion of the Church—than to plant, as it were, and water those tender saplings, so that the Almighty, shedding down upon them the divine influence of His grace, may bestow upon them a heavenly increase.

But they say, I can do so much more splendid work by sermons and discourses in the public churches.

More splendid work, I dare say, but not work more salutary or more fruitful. This desire after all of preaching to large congregations need not necessarily proceed from a very pure motive; it may arise possibly from pride and vanity. Our Divine Lord at all events teaches us by His own example to moderate and restrain such a desire, for do we not read of Him in the Gospel as holding a very prolonged discourse with one single soul for the purpose of doing her spiritual geod—viz., the Samaritan Woman?

I confess indeed I should be acting very unwisely, if for the sake of my work for children or any good that might follow therefrom, I were neglecting my own special duties as Chancellor of the University; but when I have seen to and honestly discharged these duties and when, as not unfrequently happens, I happen to have some leisure hours on my hands, who will say I am not free to give these hours to a work so holy and so salutary; why the truth is, if I spent this my free time in something immeasurably less useful, if I spent it merely in innocent amusement or legitimate recreation, no one would think of suggesting that I was doing anything reprehensible or wrone.

And as regards the unseasombleness of the time and place of my work for children, which is the third charge lodged against me, I have already in a former reflection made somewhat of a reply to this; here, however, I may remark, that the place where I carry on my work for children is the public church, which certainly is the most suitable place that can be found, and which is the most likely of all others to banish unfair suspicions from the minds of the uncharitable. It is only the person who does evil, as our Saviour says, "who shums the light;" we who are conscious to ourselves of doing not evil but good rather court the light and seck it; and all the more readily as we remember tho precept which has been laid upon us of "letting the light of our good works shine before men," and of "putting our candle not under a bushel" where nobody can see it, but "on the candlestick where it may give light to all."

Notwithstanding all this there are those who put an evil interpretation on our conduct and take scandal at it, saying that it is all vanity and show and pretence or worse.

Well, if they act in this way it is their own ffair. What reason have they got to take seandal as they do? None whatever. Their's is seandal taken, but not given; their's is Phorasaical scandal which we may very well disregard and despise, seeing that there is nothing whatever in our action or in the circumstances attending it that can with the least shadow of reason be construed into a bad or mischievous example for the faithful

It is not at all a matter of surprise to us that there should be persons who view things in this uncharitable and perverse fashion, no more than it would be to us a subject of wonder that the ray of light, which is so pleasant to eyes that are sound and healthy, should be painful and distressing to those that are diseased and sore. "We are the good odour of Christ," the Apostle declares; but observe what he adds, while we are "an odour of life unto life to some," we are "an odour of death unto death to others."

Instead of raising objections about time and place in regard of this important work of the salvation of souls, I believe that anyone who considers well how ripe and how abundant ever-where is the harvest to be gathered, and how few the workmen to gather it (I mean really efficient workmen, for those of another sort, those who, to use the language of Horace, seem dispresel rather to "consume the fruits of the harvest than to labour to save it." are numerous enough)—I believe that such a one will easily be convinced that there is no place, no day, no hour, that ought to be excluded from this glorious work.

Finally, as regards the fourth charge alleged against me—that my conduct is novel, eccentric, and without precedent—I grant that my predecessors did not engage themselves in this sort of work; but then here the familiar old proverb comes to my rescue—"Everyone according to bis taste."

And what objection is it to a work to say that it is new or unusual? New things must be undertaken at times, without them society could not possibly subsist, it should indeed necessarily collapse and go to pieces altogether.

But really is what I do so new or extraordinary? Do we not every other day see workmen going forth to the harvest of the Lord, some to labour in this way and some in that, all of them being duly commissioned thereto by those who have charge of the harvest—namely, bishops and superiors? I am merely one of these work-

If it be further objected to me that it was of my own motion I sought permission to give myself to this work, I answer—what of that: have I not the word of the Saviour to justify me: "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that he send forth labourers into his harvest" (Matt., ix., 58); and do we not read in Isaias, that when the Almighty spoke and said—"Whom shall I send, and who shall go for us," the prophet immediately replied—"Lo, here am I, send me."

I entirely fail to see what can be wrong or out of order in this conduct of mine, the more especially as I have the sanction of my superiors for it, and since I never allow myself to undertake the instruction or guidance of any children without first acquainting those who have a right to know who it is that instructs and confesses them.

Finally, having been appointed Chancellor of the Church of Paris, and being charged in no small measure both by my office and by Apostolic mandate with the care of schools and pupils, I do not know anything more in harmony with my position or the duties it imposes than to exert my-elf according to my knowledge and ability to promote the moral and religious formation of the young. My very friends, it may be, will take up the objections of others against me, and say—O your opponents, you must know, will put down this unusual method of action on your part to eccentricity, to singularity, to childishness, or some such thing.

All' my most dear friends, I know very well what my opponents will say; I have foreseen it long and have been well prepared for it. For what man was there ever yet occupying a position of prominence whose actions have not been found fault with, and even viciously and stupidly maligned?

At the same time this I ask—and I ask it in the name of that salvation to which we all aspire, and in the presence of that God before whose judgment-seat we must one day appear that (since "no one knowth the things that are within a man save the spirit of a man himself") as one will judge me save according to the standard iaid down by Christ—that is, "by my works." If my works are evil, if there is anything immoral in what I do, anything unsound in what I teach, then let me be adjudged—and I submit to the judgment—as nothing else than a wolf in sheep's clothing.

But if this is not so, if on the contrary my works are good, then let no one put me down as having an evil intent in doing them. He who would thus rashly judge and condemn me not only single as against the charity he owes his brother, but he is guilty also of placing a scandal in the way of children, who by such things are not unfrequently prevented from coming to the Saviour.

On the great day of trial that is coming all unjust and uncharitable censors shall have to render a rigid account of their conduct, but as for me I shall in that hour stand free in so far at all events as my engaging in this work for children is concerned. This my conscience testifies to me, and my perfect peace of soul as reflected in my exterior may give a similar testimony to those who know me; and if other witnesses still be wanting I have them in those multitudes of children for whom I have been labouring, and whese frank and ingenuous nature will make them ready to tell the truth about me even to my disadvantage, should there be anything of the kind to be disclosed.

And now having said so much to others let me turn to the children themselves, and have a word with them.

And I will begin by appealing to them in the words of the Book of Wisdom—" Whosoever is all little one let him come to me," and let him come without being in the least timid or afraid. No matter who the child may be, let him come and hear were it only some few simple words of counsel from my lips. This appeal I hesitate not to make; for I have a right to make it, not of myself, no, but in Christ Jesus.

My one endeavour with regard to every child who comes to me will be to urge on to whatever is right and good, and among other things it will be my care to counsel him to recount the years of his life in the bitterness of his son! (Isaias, xxxviii. 15), and "to sweep his spirit," so to say, with the brush of his own tongue—that is I will exhort him to make at some period of his childhood a general confession of his life; but neither this nor anything else shall I at any time try to force on anybody against his will.

Moreover, in my dealings with children I shall be careful never to put to them useless or irrelavant questions; nor shall I permit them on their part to make known to me things regarding their companions or anyone else which it would be better and wiser not to disclose.

As to the seal of confession, let no one ever dream I could in the least infringe against it. I am fully conscious how strict, how sacred this seal is.

And I could very carnestly desire that my penitents would be as circumspect in regard to what passes in confession as 1 am myself, and that they would never permit a foolish and wicked curriosity on the part of others to extract from them those hely confidences, which taking place in the secreey of the sacred tribunal, had better been kept for God's knowledge only.

Possibly some one may be deterred from coming to confession lest I should impose upon him a penance too difficult and severe.

No need to be afraid of this. Like William of Paris I much prefer to send souls to purgatory with a small and easy penance which they will be sure to perform, than to send them to hell with a long and difficult one which they will culpably omit.

Whoever comes to me let his sins be what they may, yet if he but confesses them fraukly and honestly, omitting nothing, and at the same time cries out like David from the depths of a repentant heart, "I have sinned against the Lord," I for my part shall be only too glad to say to him at once, as Nathan said to his royal penitent—" The Lord hath taken away thy sin." I confess I never could regard as by any means the least important element in true repentance that disgust and abhorrence of sin which drives the sinner almost perforce to confession, three honestly to acknowledge his sin and vomit it forth, as it were, out of his soul.

I do not know there can be anyone so foolish as to imagine that should he come to me to confession I would afterwards entertain towards him feelings of disdain and dislike. Never could I do anything of the kind. On the contrary no matter who the penitent be who comes to me, I shall always cherish him as my most dear child in Christ Jesus; I shall regard him as one who now possesses the fear of the Almighty, who is washed white and pure in His divine sight. And what will tend to make my esteem and regard for him all the greater will be the remembrance of the touching confidence he reposed in me when he came and laid open to me wounds and sores which he could never have the courage to disclose even to his nearest and dearest relatives.

In such manner in truth am I affected unteriorly towards penitents that the more heinous be the sins I see them repentant of the greater is the sympathy I have for them, and the more tender is the gentleness with which I feel disposed to treat them; and I am certain that were I to encounter some poor soul who had been guilty of the most horrible enormity—say the murder of his own parents—even towards such a one I would never permit myself to entertain the slightest feeling of hatred or resentment.

I am aware that penitents usually experience a certain sentiment of awkwardness or shyness in the presence of him to whom they have coniessed their sins; though indeed it would be better this were not the case. Such a feeling however soon dies away, and even while it lasts it need not be altogether useless, it can be turned to one's spiritual account by being humbly accepted as an atonement for former sine.

But perhaps some one loth to come to confession will say—Oh! I am but a cold and indevout sort of soul; I do not care for confession, nor do I see what good it is going to do me.

Now, gaunted that you are cold and have no devotion, I say for this very reason you ought to make use of confession, for it is there you will have spoken to you that "kindling word of God" which will not fail to dissipate your coldness and excite within you the spirit of fervour. How often have I not seen persons coming to the sacrament carelessly and indifferently, or it might be utterly against their will; at all events not believing it would do them any good; yet they have gone away from it entirely different—they have gone away penitent and consoled, sometimes even shedding abundance of tears.

Interior impressions and transformations of this kind we have all of us from time to time experienced. The following is a case in point with regard to myself:—

Some considerable time since I was recommending two sisters under my direction to adopt the virginal method of life, my piety suggesting to me that it was by this they would best please the Almighty, and most securely advance the interests of their own souls. After some time. however, doubts and anxieties began to take possession of my mind; this kind of life was so exceptional, the custom of the world was so entirely opposed to it. Discomposed and discouraged by these ideas I had almost abandoned my purpose and was on the point of giving a contrary advice to these two persons, when, by God's mercy, raising my thoughts from earth to heaven, from time to eternity, from this present death to the life to come, and remembering in the light of reason and of faith that all things here below are but "vanity and vanity of vanities," I was immediately enlightened and strengthened, and once for all firmly established in the purpose my piety had at first suggested to me.

Where is the human soul that has not at times as great, or it may be much greater, need than I on this occasion of being enlightened and sustained, of being encouraged to follow, not what the custom of the crowd approves, or what their own ideas for the moment imagine to be right, but what is in accordance with the unerring principles of faith and right reason? For my part I do not know any place where this enlightenment can be more certainly or more effectively given than in confession.

When instructing my penitents, my custom is (and this I must not hesitate to mention) to exhort them to do four things in particular.

But first I may also state that I am wont to endeavour to inspire my penitents with a special horror of certain kinds of sin—viz., the four following:—perjury and falsehood; detraction and calmany; injustice and violence; and lastly, impurity in action, above all those forms of it which are so gross and heinous that they itee condemned even by the civil law itself.

And now with regard to the four things I require my penitents to do. First of all I ask them never on any account to cause sin or spiritual ruin to another, this being a work fit only for the devil himself. (There is wisdom surely in the civil enactment, which requires that if a man will not be pure he will at least not be scandalous; that if he must be immoral he will not at all events parade his immorality to the contamination and perversion of his neighbours).

Secondly, I try to secure of my penitents that they exert themselves, in all prudence of course, to bring back to virtue those whom they have formerly led astray, or who have been accomplices of their guilt; that they even try to make compensation for the evil they have done in the past by drawing other souls also from vice, in this way doing no longer in the world the work of demons, but fulfilling instead the charitable offices of angels.

Thirdly, I ask of them that should they re-lapse into sin (for human frailty is very great), they have recourse again to confession as their main resource and hope; than which, however, there is nothing less to be desired, nothing more harmful (and this I repartelly try to impress upon their minds), unless they make it sincerely and well, unless they have all and vell, energy circumstances, above all those circumstances which change the species.

Fourthly, I assign to them, not as a matter of obligation, but of coursel merely, some rather easy practice of devotion, which they are continually to adhere to, and which when thus kept up will be to them a perpetual reminder of their sins, which will constitute an excellent atonement for them; and which likewise will be a very good means of preventing them from falling back into them again.

The practice I generally assign is the recital morning and evening of a "Pater" and "Ave" (with perhaps a prostration on the ground when such might be deemed advisable).

I seldom or never appoint a practice different from this, no matter what be the character of the penitents with whom I have to deal, partly because it would be scarcely practicable to do so, and partly because appointing a variety of penitential practices to any one would be only too likely to give rise to troubles and scruples of conscience. And if in enjoining this identical practice on all I am no more severe on those who come burthened with many sins than on those who have but little on their conscience. these latter can scarcely with justice complain, since they are not less bounden to Almighty God than the others, seeing that, though they have not, like them, fallen into great and numerous sins, they owe this signal favour to the divine goodness which has in a special way most mercifully supported and protected them. In conclusion, dcar children, permit me to address you in the words of the Holy Spirit—

"How long, O Children, will you love childheness" (Prov. i. 22); or again—"Why do you love vanity and seek after lying" (Psal. iv. 3).
Be no longer silly or foolishly afraid; come to me; and come with confidence; there is "no snare set for you in the way," no "serpent lying hid for you in the grass;" come and we shall communicate our goods mutually to one another—our spiritual goods of course, for there is no question of temporal ones. I on my side will impart to you the light of holy doctrine, and you on yours will give to me the benefit of your pious prayers; not only so, but I will not fail to offer up prayers for you as you for me; and thus we shall advance for each other the supreme interest of our sarctification and salvation to the intense joy of our dear Guardian Angels, on whose feast, as it happens, I ampenning to you these words.

And so perhaps it may be, so indeed it shall be, that we will find grace and favour with our heevenly Father, provided always we continue obedient to His voice—I in pointing out to you how you are to please Him and attain to Him, and you in faithfully following the lessors which by His grace I have the privilege of imparting to you.

Nor shall consolations be wanting to us meantime during the course of our pilgrimage here below; the grace of God, His leve, our union with Him—these will be our daily joy and corafort; and when eternity arrives we shall go to have our portion in the Kingdom of the Blessed, where united in God we shall live and zeioice eternally together.

To the glory of that celestial Kingdom we are all invited—we, who ought everyone of us to be children in mind and heart—we are invited by Christ himself, who, as well by the outward word of His truth as by the interior inspiration of His grace unceasingly cries out to us—" Let the Little Children come to be"."

APPENDIX*

The kind Reader, who has perused through the foregoing reflections, will have observed that the views of the pious and learned Gerson with regard to children and the work of their formation and training may be briefly summed up thus --

- 1 It is of supreme importance, it is a matter even of the strictest necessity to mould and form children while they are yet tender and pliable, and the sooner this work is begun in them the better.
- This truth is taught us by reason herself; experience confirms it, and faith proclaims it. The great men of all ages, of paganism as well as Christianity, are agreed upon it.

^{*} The Translator thinks that the following remarks which he adds by way of appendix, may help to make Father Gerson's book more generally useful.

- Give a wise and proper training to children and they will grow up in virtuous habits; the evil in them will be eliminated, and the good in them will take root, develop, and increase.
- 4. Fail to give them this training and the result will be, that by a gradual process of deterioration they will fall away farther and farther from the standard of christian morals, and will become in time the slaves of vice and of the bad passions of human nature.
- 5. This training must reach to and affect the children's minds, their hearts, their wills, their whole moral being. It must enlighten them, especially as regards the doctrines of faith and relivion, and the duties they impose; it must inbue them with proper christian dispositions and sentiments (the love of God, fear of offending Him, harred of sin, love of virtue, &c); it must lead them to exercise themselves in doing what is good, and to labituate themselves to avoiding what is evil; thus forming good habits in themselves, and eradicating evil ones, thus strengthening and perfecting their wills, which must meantine be continually brought under the salutary and all-essential influence of divine grace.

6. Special care must be taken to preserve children from the perils and scandals of the world, since they are of all classes of persons the most likely to be ruined by them; and the scandal from which above all others they must be preserved is that given around the domestic hearth—that is the scandal of neglect, and more particularly still the scandal of mischievous counsel or bad conduct on the part of the children's own friends, father, mother, brother or sister.

7. This work of training children is to be carried on by three individuals in particular the parent, the teacher and the priest; that is it must be carried on in the home, in the school, and in the church.

8. There is one means of correcting, reforming, moulding children of greater importance and of more thorough efficaciousness than any other; it is Confession, but confession honestly and candidly made.

9. Every child should be gently induced to make at some convenient time a general confession of his life; and in heaving this confession the confessor should be extremely cautions to "draw forth the hidden venom," so that the child will not conceal sins, which when kept enclosed within the heart would rankle there and, despite all that may be done for him, spoil and corrunt his whole life.

10. In instructing, exhorting or correcting children the mild method should be adopted. The parent, the teacher, the priest, above all the confessor, must by his gentleness, condescension, tenderuess win the heart of the child, must convince him that he is his true, sincere, devoted friend. In a word, he who would train a child must bove him with a genuine christian love, and he must by his conduct towards him excite within him a similar quanine christian affection towards himself.

11. Let those responsible for children but do their duties towards them in a wise, enlightened and thoroughgoing manner, and let them not be impeded by others in their work; then the children will be saved; and if the children are saved Humanity is saved.

12 Many parents neglect their children, many will continue to neglect them; many will do worse, they will by the whole tenor of their conduct and example tend to drag them down to their own low level, training them to evil instead of good, degrading and perverting them instead of reforming and elevating them. This great naischief both priest and teacher must by their zealous labours endeavour to counteract; and should the teacher, perchance, be as neglectful or as perverse as the parents, then the child's only loope is the priest, especially in his character of confessor.

13. The contessor of children, hesides being kind and condescending to them in the last degree, must also be skilful in hearing their confessions, and must go to considerable pains to secure their making their confessions well. He must instruct them and exhort them, but above all must be examine them carefully and prudently, making large ellowance always for false shame, which is so apt to make them confessions.

Such, it seems to us, is in brief the doctrine of the celebrated Gerson with regard to children and the method to be employed in bringing them to Christ. We believe his doctrine to be the true

^{*} To be a skilful confessor of children one must know them well; he must know the temptations with which they are apt to be assailed, and the many dangers with which they are surrounded, and which so often wait upon them even in their own homes; bad companionship and bad example, and that once they give way to evil they may become fearfully plunged in it, and that their bad habits are with difficulty broken; above all must be permit himself to recognise the fact that their most dangerous and most fatal pitfall is making bad confessions; that the greatest difficulty in confessing them, and will tenderly and skilfully aided to do so. All this supposes an amount of child-knowledge that everybody does not possess-far from it; and if anyone is to make this kowledge his own, he must observe and study children well; he must consult the writings and experience of others regarding them; and above all he must have had experience in bearing their one; and we think that every calightened and experienced mind will be of the same opinion.

A WORD TO PARENTS.

The translator ventures to add a brief word, addressed to parents, which may not be without utility.

Children have a strict right to this Christian training which is so essential for them - upon which their all, in time and eternity, depends.

To deprive them of it is spiritual theft and spiritual cruelty; it is an injustice done to their immortal souls, and an injustice also against God who made them for the knowledge, love and service of Himself; it is to stifle the growth of their intellectual and moral nature, the proper unfolding of which means for them nothing less. than perfection, goodness and true happiness in this world, and in the world to come all the perfection and all the happiness it is possible for the human mind to conceive or the human heart to desire; it is in truth to crush within those fresh young beings infinite capabilities of good, and to open out in them instead the certain and inevitable fountains of boundless evil.

of imparting this christian training to children are their parents. Those who gave them birth. who were God's instruments in bringing them into existence, who have received them in trust from His hand with the obligation and on the understanding of giving them back to Him again, who have by nature intimate relations with them which no one else can ever pretend to, who possess inalienable rights over them to which no individual, no institution, no form of society can ever lay claim-these it is upon whom God has thrown the responsibility of moulding and forming them in such a manner, as that they may become what He has made them to be, His true and faithful servants here, and the elect of His kingdom hereafter.

Gcd, then, and nature having placed this responsibility on parents, they cannot possibly shirk it; neither can they by any human power be dispensed from it. Let them through any fault of theirs fail in faithfully discharging it, and they have thereby failed as parents; they have transgressed the law in what is for them the most important point; they have by that one transgression alone forfeited salvation, and they have not unlikely occasioned their children to forfeit salvation also.

To mould and form children is a long and tedious work; it must be begun early; it must be carried on continually; and must never be left off as long as the children are in any way under the parents' control.

Long and difficult as the work is, the entire scope of it may be reduced to these two things to making children love what is good and do it, and to making them hate what is evil and avoid it. "Decline from evil and do good," says the Psalmist, and in saying this word he has laid down all that is required of every lumna being.

But then what is good and what is evil? Good is everything that GoD loves, wills, commands; evil is everything that GoD hates, detests, prohibits.

Gon! then, there is the first idea that must be introduced into the child's mind: God, who is Himself essential goodness and the absolute reverse of all that is evil; who loves and eternally rewards him who does good, and who hates and eternally punishes him who does evil; God, who because He is God necessarily commands all that is right and just, and necessarily forbids everything that is of a contrary nature; God, who moreover is the author of the child's being and his last end as well; this is the great Being with whom he must be made acquainted as early as possible, and the knowledge given him thus early must be made to increase in him day by day; he must, as he advances in years, and as his powers develop themselves, be made to understand more and more about the nature of God, His attributes, His relations with His creatures, all He has done for them, &c.

Above all things he must be properly instructed as regards the law of God; what He has commanded and what He has forbidden him.

The motives also (especially those that faith supplies) which are best calculated to fill him with a reverence for this law, with a willinguess to obey it and a dread of transgressing it: these must be frequently and strongly impressed upon his mind, the two chief amongst these motives being love and fear; to we of God and fear of God—a desire of His eternal chartisements, and a dread of His eternal chartisements.

By these means light, true light, is given to the child's mind; faith is developed in him; religious instincts instilled; moral sentiments evoked; he learns to love what is right and detest what is wrong; and accordingly he begins to exercise his powers in the doing of the one and the avoidance of the other, the result of this exercise being that the faculties of his soul are strengthened and perfected, the evil in his nature is gradually vanquished and destroyed. while the good is continually expanded and increased; and thus there grow up within him those virtuous habits and dispositions which give perfection to his nature, which transform him into that which he is called upon and bound to be-a true servant of God, a genuine disciple of Christ in mind and heart and life.

This exercise or effort on the part of the child to do good and avoid evil is necessarily a painful effort, for his nature is against it, and besides his temptations are many, and the world around him throws countless obstacles in his way. For this reason it is necessary that he be aided as far as possible by others, and more especially by his parents, who should continually advise, warn, encourage, correct, at times even recompense and punish him.

But since all the exertions of others in his behalf, since even his own exertions will be of no avail, unless God's grace be with him, enlightening, stimulating and supporting him; since this grace must be the beginning, middle and end of all his moral and spiritual growth, he must for this reason be brought continually under the influence of grace, he must be well instructed as to the means of obtaining it, and induced to make a faithful use of these means, which are chiefly, as everybody knows, Prayer and the Practices of Heligion.

Hence it is that the most essential element of all in the formation of a child is religion and its occreier. Let parents, or let anvone else, do what they will for children, but meantime let them fail to teach them how to pray, how to bring their minds and hearts into contact with their ('reator, or let them not conduct them to the Sacraments, let them leave them in ignorance as to how they are to receive the Sacraments properly, or let them not succeed in inducing them to receive the Sacraments as they oughtthen all is of no use: the children will not grow or "expand in Christ," their souls will dry up and become barren and stunted for want of heavenly dew, they will put on as time goes by, not goodness, not perfection, not the christian spirit; no, but the very reverse of all this: they will become invested only with sin and vice and evil habit

The knowledge of God then, this knowledge expanding more and more in the child's mind; the sense of God, of his relations with Him and his duties towards Him; this sense taking a fieller and fuller possession of him; the love of God and the fear of God, these sinking deeper and deeper into his soul; the gradual formation and development of his conscience; the continual efforts he makes to live in accordance with its dictates; the external adds he receives, such as advice, correction, punishment, &c.; the internal graces bestowed upon Him (result chiefly of his piety)—such are the instruments by which the child must be trained and formed; such the machinery, if we may be allowed the expression, which parents must bring into play in his behalf, if they are to form in him the christian spirit, if they are to succeed in bringing mm to Christ.

And here let us give in detail but very briefly, the various points to which parents must attend if they are to train up their children in accordance with the method just laid down.

These may be ranged under the four following heads:—Instruction; Correction; Example; Love.

Instruction.

 Give to your children an idea of God at as early an age as possible, and strive to impress this idea more and more upon them by frequently speaking to them of God, and above all by habituating them to the practice of uniting themselves with Him in prayer.

2. Teach them, as soon as they are in any way-capable of understanding them, the Principal Mysteries of our holy Faith, imprinting the knowledge of these mysteries so indelibly on their memories that it will be impossible for them to forget them or become ignorant of them.

3. Teach them the principal Prayers, and such devotional practices as are suitable to their age the Rosary of the Blessed Virgin, the Angelns, Examen of Conscience, and above all the practice of Ejaculatory Prayer.

4. Besides making them familiar with the lives of our Blessed Lord and our Blessed Lady, go to special pains to instruct them regarding the Commandments of God and His Church, and the two Sacraments of Confession and Communion, constantly inculcating upon them what they must do and what they must avoid; and impressing upon them, above everything else, that that upon which their virtue, happiness and salvation chiefly depend is, their going to the Sacrements regularly, and always making their confessions candidly and sincerely.

5. Keep a Catechism or book of Christian Decrine always in your homes, and by regular and repeated lessons make your children commit to memory the answers to the questions, giving what explanation you can of their meaning, and taking occasion every now and then from the truths that arise to impact to them some useful and practical lessons for the guidance and reformation of their conduct.

6. Be serupulously exact about sending your children to School and to Sunday and Week-day Catechism; and once they have come to the proper age never on any account permit them to be guilty of the gross and most mischievous sin of omitting the Mass of obligation without just cause.

7. Promote the Spirit of Piety in them by every means in your power (taking care however not to over-dose or surfeit them with long prayers or too many pious practices), an excellent means to this end being to make them become members of some suitable religious Scdality, the meetings of which they are afterwards faithfully to attend.

8. Be most desirous to have them prepared as early as possible for their First Confession and First Communion.

9 Once they have gone to confession, urge them sweetly but strongly to continue going, as a rule once every two months, until about the time of their First Communion, after which you should induce them to make it their practice to go once at least every month.

Correction.

 Do not expect too much of your children; they will have faults, and can only get over these faults by carrying on a long-continued struggle against them.

2. Regard it as a great gain if their defects are not kept under cover, but come out and are seen and known by you, for to know your children's faults is the first step towards being able to induce them to amend them.

3. Be not for ever railing at and scolding your children when they make mistakes or do wrong; this only sours them against you, and makes them lose their respect and affection for you.

4. Never correct them when you are excited by anger or passion; for such correction will do them no good, and the passion you manifest will but do harm to both them and you.

5. When correcting them invariably do so with mildness, though with authority and firmness. Correct them with such an inward feeling of parental charity and with such an outward calm and zeal of manner that they cannot help but feel that the correction you give, how-soever severe it be, proceeds purely from the love you bear them and the desire you have to promote their well-being and happiness.

6. In correcting them let your object be not to pain or punish them, but to reform them: and with this end in view always correct at such times and in such circumstances as will best reuder the correction effectual.

7. Sometimes when you find it necessary severely to reprimand or to punish your child, either before or after do him some kindness that will be particularly agreeable to him; this will but give additional effect to your correction, and will prevent it from estranging him in any way from you.

3. Be not too anxious that your children feary you, but be very desirous that they obey and respect you, and be much more desirous still that they esteem and love you. Fear is good, but Obedience is better; while Love is best of all and includes all. If they love you they will obey you, and then there will be little need of their fearing you.

9. While you must be careful not to worry your children by too frequently upraiding them for their defects, you must at the same time make it your rule not to pass by any full of the least consequence which you observe in them, but invariable show your displeasure thereat, if were only by a look, a word, a gesture.

10. While being ready to forgive and even sometimes to overlook trivial failings or such as come from childish thoughtlessness, and much more such things as are not faults at all, though they may be very annoying to you, yet you must be stern and severe in regard to grave and serious defects, or such as would result in serious consequences if they were not looked to and amended.

11. The faults which you must be particularly careful not to tolerate in your children are—lying, dishonesty, immodesty, in all its forms, and associating with bad or dangerous companions, even those of their own sex.

12. The virtues which you must particulary insist on are Truthfulress, Honesty, Purity and Obedience.

13. You must not expose your children or allow them to be exposed to any dangers to their purity, especially in your homes, bearing in mind that those parents incur a fearful responsibility and are unworthy of sacramental absolution who violate the plain dictates of modesty, prudence and parental duty, by the manner in which they treat their children in regard of their skeping apantments, forcing them centinually into such dangers as make it next to impossible for them to preserve their virtue. You should never forget that modesty is the safeguard of purity, and that if you do not indoctrinate your children in modest principles and modest practices, if you place them in circumstances and surroundings which mean simply an end of modesty, you thereby inevitably ensure their making speedy shipwreck of their virtue.

Nor let it be said that their simplicity, their innocence will save them, will prevent that from being a pitfall to them which would certainly be a pitfall to others. It will do nothing of the kind. Indeed their simplicity will, under the dangerous circumstances alluded to above, be the very thing perhaps that will occasion their falling into errors, which will be a frightful snare and entanglement to them, which will be to them the beginning of their downward course, which will introduce into their soul a fatal venom that remaining there festering for years, all the while perhaps undivulged in the Sacra. ment of Penance, will lay their whole moral lives utterly waste, and bring them into the category of those children or young persons mentioned by Gerson at page 64, who have for long been addicted to certain evil habits, but have never acknowledged them in the Sacrament of Penance

14. When conversing in presence of your children accustom yourselves to speak condemnatory of what is wrong, and commendatory of what is right; and frequently impress upon them, that when they happen to see or know of evil in others they should there and then resolve never to do the like themselves, while on the other hand whenever they writness anything good in their neighbour their immediate determination should be to imitate on titting occasions such salutary and edifying example.

15. As regards the infliction of punishment, cspecially corporal punishment, have recourse to it only when you have exhausted to no purpose the ordinary means of correction; and always select such punishment as will rather inspire your children with shame for the faults they have committed than of fear of the chastisements which these faults deserve.

16. When your children have done well, show vourselves pleased; commend them for the efforts you see them make, helping them by encouraging words from time to time; even on occasione, especially when they have shown themselves particularly good in any respect, do them some favour, confer upon them some reward.

Example.

1. Three truths keep in mind—(a) no creature is more given to imitating whatever it sees or hears than the child; (b) the child is much more sure to imitate its own relations, and above all its own parents, than anybody else; (c) and unfortunately owing to its fallen nature it is much more apt to imitate what is bad than what is good. From this follow two things—first, that the greatest of all dangers, the most pernicious of all influences, the most fatal of all disasters for the child is bad example under the parental roof; and above all bad example on the prt of the father or mother; and secondly that there is no more powerful help for a child, no more precious or desirable blessing, than good example.

in its immediate friends, and above all in its parents.

2. Never then let your children hear anything of evil from your lips; never let them withen anything of evil in your conduct. Nothing can be of more importance for either parent or child shea this, for nothing can do more harm to the souls of both parent and child than scandal on the part of the former towards the latter.

3. On the contrary, let every word you speak in your children's presence be blameless, good and edifying; and let the manner of life they at all times behold in you be such as to estrange them from vice and lead them to virtue.

- 1. Desire nothing in the world more than to have your children good.
- 2 While being always very kind to them, do not on any account spoil them by indulging them and letting them have their own way in everything.
- 3. If after any fault you see them truly penitent and sincerely disposed not to commit the same again, generously forgive, and even forget, the evil they have done.

- Never let a day pass without praying for them to God, and asking the Blessed Virgin to watch over them and protect them.
 Frequently examine yourself to see if you
- are faithfully performing all your duties towards them; and whatever fault you find conscientiously acknowledge it in confession, and afterwards strenuously endeavour to amend it.

THE NATURE OF CATECHISTIC WORK.*

On a certain occasion a priest was asked his opinion as to what was the most important

We venture to add on the following to this little book: I was written as an article for the Irisi Ecclesiastical Record, and appeared in the February number of that Pertolical, 1883. It was afterwards brought out in pamphlet form at the suggestion of a venerable Perlate, who In a letter to the writer of the property of the Perlate, who In a letter to the writer of the property of the Perlate, who may be a supported by the Perlate who may read the "Crimnslator". Perents who may read the "Crimnslator".

function of the sacred ministry, and his reply was, the catechising of the children. He was then asked what he considered the next most important function, and he gave the same response—the catechising of the children. It was a style of answer like to what St. Augustine said of humility, when he was asked what was the first and most important element in the Christian life; or like to the observation of the Grecian orator, who said that in eloquence action was the first requisite, and the second, and the third; or, again, like to the remark of Father Faber, in his Spiritual Conferences, where, speaking of the best method of resisting temptation, he says: -" Cheerfulness is the first thing, cheerfulness is the second, cheerfulness the third "

Now, was there any exaggeration in the reply given by this priest to his querist? We do not think there was. For we have the weightiest authorities, we have men eminent for piety, for learning, for positien, plainly stating that not merely is the catechising of children a function not in any degree inferior to the others of our ministry, but that it is even paramount to the rest.

The late Monsigneur Dupanloup, in his book entitled L'Œurre par excellence, calls the catechising of children "a great work, the most important of all priestly works, that which St. Paul designates the opus ministerii, opus Christi." And, again, he calls it "a work which we ought to rank highest in the Church of Jesus Christ." The celebrated Gerson, in his treatise, De Parvulis ad Christum trahendis, says:—"Nescio prorsus an quidquam majus esse possit quam tales parvulos quasi plantare aut rigare." And Pope Cuement XI. declared that teaching the rudiments of Christian doctrine to the children was the "praecipuum animarum rectoris munns."

If we are to credit authorities such as these, then it is scarcely possible to exaggerate the importance, the excellence, the grandeur of this work, this "praecipuum animarum rectoris munus."

The other functions of the ministry are, no doubt, grand; they are sublime; their sublimity is, indeed, unspeakable; and their utility and necessity are as great as their sublimity.

To preach the word of God to the people, to shed its salutary light on their minds, by its divine power to touch, move, transform, sanctify, save their souls: to confess penitents in the tribunal of penance; to pour out upon them the cleansing blood of the Redeemer; to shut for them the gates of hell, to open for them the gates of heaven; afterwards to break for them the bread of life; to comfort and console them in the hour of death, and to prepare them by the last sacramental rites for the tremendous passage into eternity: these surely are most stupendous functions; functions most holy and most necessarv. And what far-reaching, what eternal interests depend upon them! Yet we are told by illustrious personages, whose word none of us will venture to gainsay, that of all those functions not one deserves a higher appreciation, not one is entitled to a more devoted and untiring zealthat they indeed, if possible, merit a less careful durgence on the part of the priest-than the sublime and all-important function of catechising the little children

It is not our business now, or our intention, to give the reasons for the importance and sublimity of this work. What we propose to ourselves is merely to point out what this work is: what is its nature, it secope; what was the precise idea such eminent men as we have mentioned have had of it; what was the idea entertained of it by enlightened Christian men of all ages; what is the idea we ought to have of it ourselves.

In the first place, the teaching of the Catchism to the children is not merely getting them to commit to memory the answers contained in the Catechism. It means this certainly; but it means much more than this. The careful committal to memory is but the first step in this important work; it is but the beginning, the foundation of the building.

Our object, surely, in teaching the Catechism to the children is to communicate to them knowledge: that at the very least. If after all our classes and lessons the little ones have not a true and substantial knowledge of Christian doctrine, our teaching may be regarded as vain and fruitless. But merely committing the answers is not knowledge, nor does it necessarily imply knowledge. It may be a mere achievement of the memory, and no more, the intellect having little or nothing to do with it.

That young lad, who so glibly spins out for you all those answers with such verbatim exactitude may be as unconscious of the meaning of what he says as that dumb companion by his side, who is so "blissfully" ignorant of even the words of the Catechism as to be able to give you no answer at all; he may be all the while only going through a kind of mechanical process, for which his memory may deserve some credit, but his intelligence none. Test him outside the Catechism: ask him the same or similar questions in words different from those he is accustomed to, and, it may be, he will find himself completely "at sea," Missing the old familiar form of question, which from association easily brought the answer to his mind, he will now be able to give no answer at all. Certainly this will be the case if his cate hetical teaching has been confined to the mere mechanical process of committing the answers to memory.

But suppose the catechist has gone much farther than this; suppose he has taught the children to know the Catechism, to know it really well; he has, let us imagine, in the progress of the lessons carefully explained every sentence and every word; he has not let a single difficulty pass without entirely unravelling it: by a happy use of illustration and example, he has made even abstruse things plain to the children's minds; in short, by his skill as an instructor, he has in the course of time transformed his juvenile pupils into actual little prodigies of theological lore; even so, is the Catechism as taught in such case all it ought to be? is it Catechism in its full, true, proper sense? is it that priestly function and work, which is claimed to be the most important, or one of the most important, duties of the ministry? No: Catechism understood aright means more than this: another element must yet be added, without which the work remains a lame, sterile, unfinished thing.

The instruction of the children, the communicating of religious knowledge to their minds, is, of course, of supreme importance. No one doubts it; for everyone knows that ignorance in religious matters—ignorance as regards religious truths and duties—is fatal. But of what use is all the religious knowledge in the world without virtue? Ah! Virtue! there is something better and higher than knowledge, something more necessary for the children. Knowledge is but the means, virtue is the end; knowledge is but the flower, virtue is the fruit; knowledge only brings responsibility, but virtue establishes a claim to the kingdom of God.

Now here is the third element that enters into the work of the Cutechism; the children must, by means of the knowledge given them, be trained and formed to Christian virtue. That they be made to "commit" the answers in the Catechism is necessary; that they be made to understand the doctrinal truths the Catechism contains is more necessary still; but what is more important than either is that the knowledge given them results in their being good, sincere, practical Christians. This is the crown, the fruit, the perfection of the work.

If children possessed the two faculties only, memory and understanding, then, indeed, in giving them instruction it would be sufficient to attend to these faculties alone; when you had stored the former with religious truths, and enlightened the latter with a competent knowledge of these truths, then you would have done your work; there would be no need to extend it to further limits.

But children have other facultie's besides memory and understanding—they have heart, they have conscience, they have will; they possess a soul with its passions, weaknesses, affections, aspirations; a soul destined for two momentous futures—an earthly one, and an eternal one. To all these things must the Catechism react; upon every one of them must it be made to shed its benign and fructifying influence, otherwise it is not Catechism; it is but a faint and imperfect semblance of what Catechism ought to be. The true business of catechistic teaching is to mould and form the child; to clevate and perfect its moral nature; to awaken, rectify, and purity its conscience; to strengthen the natural infirmity of its will by inspiring it with a dread of everything that is evil, and with a love 'or everything that is good. In a word, the true work of Catechism is to make the child an enlightened Christian if you will, but certainly a virtuous one.

That this is the correct view of the Catechism on one will think of denying. Indeed, if we study closely the relations that subsist between the priest* who teaches the Catechism and his little flock who learn it, it will be seen at once that there can be no other view. Look at him and them assembled there in the clurreh for the Christian doctrine. Do not the circumstances of the case necessarily constitute him not a meropedagogue or teacher to these young souls, but a very savjour to them. No one knows better than he what these little children are: immortal spirits who have lately come from the bosom of the Deity, and who are destined to return thither soon again. No one knows better the helpless-

What is here said of the Priest is in some measure ue of every other Catechist also.

ness of their condition, and the many wants of their weak, untaught, inexperienced, and as yet, perhaps, innocent souls. No one knows better the life they have to face: a life full for them of the most serious dangers. And well is he aware that, unless they are duly prepared for these dangers, the bright hopes one may be inclined to entertain about them now will soon be extinguished, and they like so many other innocent victims will be swept away by the strong current of the world's injunity.

Nor can he forget his own position, his own calling in their regard. He is conscious that he is their priest, their divinely constituted teacher and guide; that it is to him and him alone the Saviour has said: "Feed these My lambs." It is impossible for him then to mistake the nature of the work he is called upon to do. As he looks out upon those children seated before him, and as they look up to him, do not those bright, carnest, confiding eyes of theirs seem to appeal to him for counsel, for advice, for help, or strength, for something to buoy them up amid the dangers of this sea of human life upon which they have entered? Does there not a cry rise up to him from every little heart in that audience; a cry which makes itself articulate in words like these: - "Father, I am but a child, a frail, ignorant child. Oh! there are so many things I ought to know. and I know so little. Oh! I want some one to teach me, some one to guide my steps, You, a holy priest, and one nearer to God than anybody else, you are the person to do it for me. Oh! do instruct me in everything that is necessary for me. Tell me all I ought to know and all I ought to do. Tell me about God, about heaven, about eternity, about hell: tell me about Jesus, who came down from heaven for me, and died for me. Show me how I am to love Him, and make myself dear to Him. Oh! not merely teach me those things, but deeply imprint and engrave them on my heart. Cause me to feel them, to be subdued and carried away by them; cause me to live in accordance with them. Knowledge is good for me, but it is not enough. I want something greater, something better than knowledge. I want to be what God made me to be. I want to be good and happy; yes, good and happy, nothing less. I want never to commit sin. I want to save my soul."

It cannot be said that these ideas are mere fancies. No; they spring from reality, and are justified by the circumstances of the case. There are the children's souls, naked, hungry, helpless, unprepared for what is coming. From the depths of their need and their danger their cry rings out clear and unmistakable; and to whom but their priest and their catechist is the cry addressed?

In the school with their master or their mistress the children are, we may admit, but scholars, but at the Catechism, conducted by their priest, it is not so. There they are the little ones of Christ, the favourite ones of His flock; there they are the lambs of the fold who come seeking those nourishing pastures which they cannot find of themselves, but which their divinely-appointed shepherd is bound to discover for them, in accordance with the Saviour's precept: Pasee Agnos moos.

And the catechist, on his part, what is he? He is, by no means, a mere teacher or professor: he is much more; he is priest, apostle, educator, father; he is one whose duty it is to cherish, to support, to convert, to inflame; one who has for his divine calling to sanctify and save the souls of others, and especially the souls of children; one who should not merely point out the way to heaven to those favourites of the Saviour, but who should even guide and conduct them thither; "who should bear them thither in his very arms." "I affirm with persistence," savs Monsigneur Dupanloup, "and with a certainty of not meeting with a possible contradiction, that the Christian catechist, really worthy of this great name, is a holy minister, invested with an august character, that he may accomplish the most beautiful work in young souls: he is a shepherd who knows the most dear sheep of the flock of Jesus Christ; who calls them by their names, who goes before them, and anxiously leads them into the pastures of eternal life: ante eas vadit: he is a father who loves his children with tenderness; he is a mother whose pleasure it to nourish them; fully justifying the words of Fenelon: "Be fathers: but that is not enough, be mothers." There will be no danger of our having an ctroneous or inadequate idea of catechistic work, if we keep well in view the end to be accomplished by it. What is that end? It is the sanctification and salvation of the souls of the children.

Now, what will sanctify, what will save the children? The recitation of the Catechism will not do it. Neither will the knowledge of the Catechism, however accurate or extensive that knowledge may be. The knowledge is, as we have already said, absolutely necessary. Without it the children will grow up in spiritual ignorance, and become a prey to all those evils to which such ignorance is sure to give rise.

It must also be confessed that this knowledge will, of itself, tend considerably to the moral improvement of the children. To know truth is a first step taken towards its practice.

Besides when religious ideas have been instilled into the mind, they will, in some measure, at all events, be likely to make an impression on the heart. This impression circumstances may afterwards deepen. That child who has at the Catechism learned some particular truth, will perhaps on some future occasion seriously reflect upon it, or his pious parent, by some moving advice or exhortation, will drive it home to his conscience, or the interior illumination of divine grace will present it to his intelligence in a forcible and striking manner. Circumstances like these, operating on the child, will cause the truth, whatever it be, that he has learned at Catechism, to penetrate to his heart; will cause the knowledge that is already in his mind to overflow into his conscience, stimulating and exciting it; and so a moral effect, a moral amelioration, will have been brought about in the child's soul. This effect, however, this amelioration, be it observed, is not due to the child's knowledge, as such, but springs from the fact that the truth of which he had been made conscious is presented to his mind in such a manner and in such circumstances, as that it strikes, moves, actuates him, penetrates to the depths of his soul.

In moral matters there are, as everybody, knows, two kinds of knowledge. One is dead and barren of results, the other lives and imparts vitality and energy to the soul; one rests merely in the mind, the other penetrates to the depths of the heart; one is mere theory, the other shows itself in practice; one is the letter that kills, the other is the spirit that giveth life.

In catechetical teaching, the former knowledge must, of course, be imparted, for without it the latter could not exist, but of itself, and cparr from the latter, it is utterly useless in so far as the sanctification and salvation of the soul are concerned. That which converts and saves souls is not, knowing the truth, but feeling it, being subdued by it.

Those children who have the best knowledge of Catechism are not always those who practice its lessons most faithfully. The very reverse is not unfrequently the case. Have we not all lad experience of this? Have we not at times met with children who possessed a singularly good knowledge of the Catechism, who were as "shining lights" in the midst of their companions, but who nevertheless were addicted to vices and evil labits, that instead of being corrected by the superior knowledge which these children possessed, rather kept pace with it; or, perhaps, grew daily more and more inveterate in spite of it? And, on the other hand, have we not oftentimes land experience of children, who though having but an imperfect knowledge of Christian doctrine, and having but little opportunity, perhaps of acquiring it, have, notwithstanding, preserved their innocence, established themselves in virtuous labits, or, it may be, have corrected themselves of former evil courses?

Now, why the difference between those two classes of children? Why has truth been so inoperative in regard of the one, so very effective in regard of the other? May not the explanation be frequently found in this fact, that in the former case the children, though they were taught much, were but little or not at all impressed; while, in the latter case, though taught but little, they were brought under the power of that little and made to feel it.

The former children, those who morally were unaffected by their religious knowledge, had for their catechist only a lay teacher, who had no idea of the catechistic work beyond the merc recitation of the words, with, perhaps, the most meagre explanation of some manifest difficulty now and again; or, it may be, their catechist was a priest, whose idea did not rise very much higher; who, from inadvertence, conceived the great end of Catechism to be nothing more than the proper instruction of children in the rudiments of the Christian doctrine; and who, therefore, confined his attention, and the efforts of his zeal, to the attaining of this object alone; forgetting meantime, the loftier and far more essential work of seizing upon and christianising, so to say, the hearts of the children. Being a good teacher, perhaps, and being in earnest at his work, he succeeded in what he wanted to accomplish; he made his pupils good scholars in religious matters; but, from a lamentable oversight, he left out that, without which even the work he did was worth little; he forgot to make it his principal aim to mould, to form, to convert, to save the children; he failed to employ the due methods and resources to bring about this great purpose, and so in spite of all his teaching, and in spite of all his pupils' progress in the Catechism, they remained, in so far as morals were concerned, in the state in which they were before, or they fell to a worse condition.

On the other hand, those children who preserved their innocence, or were reformed from evil ways, had the happiness of attending a Catechism conducted by a pions and enlightened priest, who, whatever store he may have set on his pupils' instruction as such, regarded their religious education as of much greater importance, and who, therefore, carefully seized upon every opportunity, and made use of every possible means to make salutary religious impressions upon them, and to bring them entirely under the sway of the truths that he taught to them.

Not content with explaining the words of the Catechism, and of giving clear and simple expositions of doctrine, he frequently addressed his little audience in strong and moving discourses; he narrated to them interesting, and even thrilling stories, and examples; he painted before their young but quick imaginations striking pictures and scenes; he taught them how to pray, to practice self-examination, to make their confessions and communions, to perform acts of the various virtues, both interior and exterior; he exercised them in such practices of piety as were suitable to their age; he repeatedly endeavoured to inspire them with a love and fear of the Almighty, with a dread of sin, and a desire of virtue; in a word, by a variety of most happy methods and expedients he strove to make those young souls entirely captive to the religious truths which they were learning from him from day to day; and thus he not merely taught them, but he moulded and formed them; he not merely communicated to them Christian knowledge, but likewise Christian sentiments and principles: he not merely made them acquainted with religion, but likewise induced them to live as religion prescribes.

We think we have here pointed out the cause why many children, some of them innocent, and more the reverse, begin at an early age to live a life of virtue; and why, on the other hand, many others become, and remain, a prey to those evil passions and vices that so naturally spring up in the hearts of the young.

The former are taught their religion, taught it by some one who is capable of teaching it correctly and effectively; they are not merely taught it, but they are practised in it, and trained in it.

The latter class of children either are not taught religion at all, or they are taught it but imperfectly; or, if some fair amount of know-ledge of it is given to them, it is a barren and fruitless knowledge, one that does not reach their hearts, draw out and form their consciences, seize upon and subdue their moral nature: it is a knowledge that instructs, but does not educate; that communicates light, but infuses no heat.

Whether, therefore, we look to the spiritual needs of the children or the relations that subsist between them and their catechist; whether we regard the interests of their souls in this world or the world to come; whether we take into account the commandment of Christ laid upon everyone responsible for the souls of children, or what our own knowledge and good sense suggest to us, there can be but one view with regard to the nature and end of Catechism, or of what had better be called, as Mr. Dupanloup observes, Catecuisme Work: it is to make enlightened and good christians of the children.

And that this has been at all times the view of the Church, the fathers, the doctors, the saints, of all enlightened priests and catechists. no one can entertain a shadow of doubt. "The Catechism," says the Bishop of Orleans, "is not simply instruction, it is education: it is not only to tear's Christianity to the children, it is to educate the children in Christianity,"

"There are three stages," he again writes, in the work of the Catechism: there is the Catechism recited, the Catechism explained, and then the Catechism practised. The recitation without the explanation is nothing...
the recitation and explanation without the practice is little better, for it is the practice of the Catechism alone saves souls, it is the practice of the Catechism which alone makes Christians, which forms Christian minds and hearts, and wins to their Creator and their God those souls whom Jesus Christ has bought with His blood."

And Frassinetti writes:—"Teaching children Christian doctrine should not be a bare, dry teaching of the truths of faith, such as to tell them there is a God, there is a hell, &c.; but it should be a teaching full of life and vigour, which influmes the heart at the same time that it enlightens the mind."

If catechising the children be what we have said, if it involves what we have laid down, then every catechist who understands his work will always keep in view these three great ends —(1) to make the children commit carefully to memory the words of the Catechism; (2) to make them understand (according to the grade or stage they have reached) the meaning of what the Catechism contains; and (3) to effect, that while religious knowledge is communicated to them, they be at the same time imbued with religious sentiments and principles. The fibte-he will regard as important, the second as more important still, the last he will look upon as the most important of all; and if he directs the effects of his skill and his zeal, if he adopts every possible expedient and resource to secure that the children know the words and their meaning, he will likewise do everything in his power to touch the children's hearts; to awaken and form their consciences; to bring their wills, their souls, their lives, under the power and influence of the Christian teaching that is being given them.
